they require the prosecutor to anticipate the defence (2 Chit. Cr. L. 312; 3 Stark. Ev. 858), and so far as inconsistent with the rule above stated, are not now law. The defendant can, of course, cross-examine the witness who proves his evidence to prove that he corrected or explained his evidence. R. v. Carr, 1 Sid. 418.

(f) R. v. Rowley, ubi sup. In R. v. Munton, 3 C. & P. 498, three witnesses stated what the defendant had said on the trial of an indictment for an assault, and the defendant was convicted, although none of the witnesses took down the evidence as it was given, and none of them professed to state the whole of the evidence given. And this course has been followed in subsequent cases. R. v. Meek, reported, 9 C. & P. 513, as to another point. R. v. Ann Bird, Gloucester Spr. Ass. 1842, Cresswell, J., ante, p. 500.

and read for that purpose; but he is not entitled to require it to be regularly proved by calling the attesting witness or the like (g).

Where the perjury is assigned on an affidavit, deposition or examination signed by the prisoner, the original must be produced and verified, and secondary evidence is not admissible (h), except on proof that the original is lost or destroyed (i), or under the control of the prisoner (j).

It seems that if a party produces an affidavit, purporting to have been made by him before commissioners in the country, and makes use of it in a motion in the cause, it will be evidence against him that he made it (k).

Upon an indictment for perjury alleged to have been committed upon the hearing of an information for sporting without a game certificate, in order to prove what the defendant swore before the magistrate, his deposition taken in writing before the magistrate was put in, and it was held that evidence was not admissible of other things stated by the defendant, when he was examined as a witness before the magistrate, but which were not contained in the written deposition (l).

Upon an indictment for perjury in an affidavit which was signed with the mark of the defendant, it appeared on production of the affidavit that the jurat omitted to state that it was read over to the defendant (m); Littledale, J., said: 'As the defendant is illiterate, it must be shewn that she understood the affidavit. In those cases where the affidavit is made by a person who can write, the supposition is that such person was acquainted with its contents, but in the case of a marksman it is not so. If in such case the master by the jurat authenticates the fact of its having been read over, we give him credit; but if he does not, and the fact were so, he ought to be called to prove it. I should have difficulty in allowing the evidence of any other person to that fact.' And no evidence being adduced to shew that the affidavit was read over in the presence of the defendant, it was held that the assignments of perjury on this affidavit could not be supported (n).

(l) R. v. Wylde, 6 C. & P. 380, Park, J. The correctness of this decision seems questionable. In the case of summary convictions there is no statute which requires magistrates to take down the evidence in writing, and therefore what a party says in an examination before a magistrate on such an occasion may be proved by parol, whether any person took it down or not. Robinson v. Vaughton, 8 C. & P. 252, Alderson, B. Inasmuch, therefore, as all the defendant said might have been proved by parol, it is difficult to see how the deposition being put in could prevent other matters not contained in it from being proved by parol. The distinction between depositions in felony and in summary convictions was not noticed in this case, nor was any reference made to R. v. Harris, 1 Mood. 338. And the decision in the text appears at variance with the ordinary practice of examining a witness in cases of felony as to other statements made by him before the committing magistrate, after his deposition had been put in and read. C. S. G.

(m) Unless the jurat so states, other evidence must be given that the affidavit was read over to the defendant.

Where the evidence was given orally it must be proved by a person present when it was given, e.g., a shorthand writer or other person who took a note of it which he can verify, or a person who can swear from memory to the substance of the evidence. The clerk of the Court may be called for this purpose, but it is unusual and inexpedient, even if lawful, to call the judge.

Where a bill of indictment was preferred for perjury, alleged to have been committed at Quarter Sessions, it was proposed to examine the chairman of the Quarter Sessions at the trial at which the alleged perjury was committed, but he expressed a desire not to be examined as a witness to prove what was sworn before him; Patteson, J., held that he ought not to be examined. He was the president of a Court of Record, and it would be dangerous to allow such an examination, as the judges of England might be called upon to state what occurred before them in Court (o).

On an indictment for perjury committed on a trial at the assizes before a Queen's counsel, his notes of the evidence, proved to be in his handwriting, were tendered in evidence, but were held inadmissible (p).

A grand juror in England may not be called to prove perjury committed before the grand jury (q).

In a case of perjury where the statements of the prisoner had not been taken down and were proved from memory, some observations being made as to the judge of the County Court who had tried the case not being called to prove his notes, though he was willing to appear; Byles, J., said that the judges of the superior Courts ought not, of course, to be called upon to produce their notes. If he were subpoenaed for such a purpose he should certainly refuse to appear. But the same objection was not applicable to the judges of inferior Courts; he saw no reason why they should not be called, especially where, as in this case, the judge was willing to appear (r).

In R. v. Withers (s) the notes of a County Court judge seem to have

In the absence of his evidence, the bill was ignored. The case is noted with a query in 3 Stark. 361. In R. v. Jones, 6 C. & P. 137, on an indictment for perjury, the chairman of the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions proved what a witness swore on a trial before him at the Quarter Sessions. 'It would, no doubt, be extremely inconvenient if the judges were called upon to give evidence as to what occurred before them in court, but the inconvenience in the case of chairmen of Quarter Sessions is comparatively slight, especially as they are usually present at the Assizes, and the evidence must be given in the county where they are chairmen. Assuming, however, that the inconveniences in their case were considerable, it seems worthy of further consideration how far that can prevent their liability to be called as witnesses. The general rule undoubtedly is, that every person is liable to be compelled to give evidence in a criminal case, and it may be dangerous to introduce exceptions which may prevent persons from giving evidence either for the Crown or for the defendant.' Statements or admissions by the prisoner, whether sworn or unsworn, may be put in evidence against him to prove any allegation in the indictment. Thus statements made by the prisoner in a petition to an insolvency Court, uncontradicted by any conflicting testimony, were held good evidence to prove allegations on an indictment for perjury as to the condition of the prisoner's affairs and the presentation of the petition (t).

Where an indictment for perjury alleged that a bill was pending in the Court of Chancery, and that it became material to ascertain whether an annuity granted by G. H. to the defendant, or granted to J. B. B., as trustee for the defendant, had been paid up to 1828, and that the defendant falsely swore that the annuity had not been paid up to 1828; and in order to shew that B., who was abroad, had paid the money to the defendant, it was proved that B. had sent money to his banker's by his clerk; it was held that what the clerk said about the money at the time he paid it into the banker's was admissible in evidence, on the ground that it was a declaration made by an agent acting at the time within the scope of his authority (u).

On an indictment for perjury alleged to have been committed on the trial of A. P., for an indecent assault, it appeared that the prisoner had sworn that P. had assaulted her at a certain time and place, but on cross-examination she had admitted that certain liberties had been taken without resistance; whereon the judge directed an acquittal. P. and others were called to prove that no such assault could have been committed at the time alleged; and it was held that the prisoner was entitled to prove what her conduct was immediately after the alleged assault; that she had made immediate complaint; and that all the evidence which was admissible on the trial of the assault was admissible for the purpose of shewing that the prisoner was not guilty (w).

The defendant is of course entitled to adduce evidence to prove that the evidence alleged to be false was qualified or explained by later answers, whether in an oral examination or on affidavits, &c. (x).

Competency.—Most of the common law rules as to the competency judge's notes was that the prisoner swore as alleged, except that they did not describe M. P.'s house as in the parish of M. Rolfe, B., held that the allegation might be made out by proving orally that M. P.'s house was in that parish.

to think that the second signature was admissible as part of the transaction out of which the charge rose. And, the prisoner not objecting, the paper was handed to the jury.

Where, upon an indictment for perjury committed upon a criminal trial, the alleged perjury arose upon evidence given in reply to the testimony of one of the defendants on the former trial, who was acquitted and examined as a witness, and the indictment did not state his acquittal, nor did the minute of the verdict produced shew it; it was held that, although the evidence of a shorthand writer, who stated that the defendant was acquitted and then examined, was not any proof of his acquittal, yet it was good proof that he was examined (y).

SECT. II.—PERJURY UNDER THE STATUTE OF ELIZABETH.

By 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9, s. 3 (1540), it is inter alia provided that 'no person or persons of what estate, degree, or condition soever he or they be do hereafter unlawfully' . . . 'suborn any witness by letters, rewards, promises, or by any other sinister labour or means' . . . 'to the procurement or occasion of any manner of perjury by false verdict, or otherwise in any manner of court aforesaid,' i.e. in any of the King's Courts which have authority by the King's Commission, patent, or writ, to hold plea of lands or determine the title to lands. The penalty is forfeiture of £10 by action or information, whereof half goes to the King, half to the person suing.

5 Eliz. c. 9 (1562) (z), after reciting the above enactment, provides (sect. 1) that 'all and every such person and persons which . . . shall unlawfully and corruptly procure any witness or witnesses by letters, rewards, promises, or by any other sinister and unlawful labour or means whatsoever, to commit any wilful and corrupt perjury, in any matter or cause whatsoever now depending, or which hereafter shall depend in suit and variance, by any writ, action, bill, complaint, or information, in any wise touching or concerning any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any goods, chattels, debts, or damages, in any of the courts before mentioned (a), or in any of the Queen's Majesty's courts of record, or in any leet, view of frank-pledge or law-day, ancient demesne court, hundred court, court baron, or in the court or courts of the stannary in the counties of Devon and Cornwall; or shall likewise unlawfully and corruptly procure or suborn any witness or witnesses, which shall be sworn to testify in

Sect. 2. ' If any person or persons . . . either by the subornation, unlawful procurement, sinister persuasion, or means of any others, or by their own act, consent, or agreement, wilfully and corruptly commit any manner of wilful perjury, by his or their deposition (d) in any of the Courts before mentioned, or being examined ad perpetuam rei memoriam, that then every person or persons so offending, and being thereof duly convicted or attainted by the laws of this realm, shall for his or their said offence lose and forfeit twenty pounds, and to have imprisonment by the space of six months without bail or mainprize' . . . Sect. 2 further provides that one moiety of the said forfeitures shall be to the Queen, and the other moiety to such person as shall be grieved, hindered, or molested by reason of any of the offences before mentioned, that will sue for the same, &c.; and sect. 3, that as well the judge and judges of every such of the said Courts where any such suit shall be, and whereupon any such perjury shall be committed, as also the justices of assize and gaol delivery, and justices of the peace at their quarter sessions (e), both within the liberties and without, may inquire of, hear, and determine all offences against the said Act. And it is provided (sect. 5) that the said Act shall no way extend to any spiritual or ecclesiastical Court, but that every such offender, as shall offend in term as aforesaid, shall be punished by such usual and ordinary laws as are used in the said Courts. the making thereof; but that every such judge may proceed in the punishment of all offences punishable before the making of the said statute, in such wise as they might have done and used to do to all purposes, so that they set not on the offender less punishment than is contained in the said Act (f).

The statutes of Henry and Elizabeth did not apply to a witness for the Crown (g). They are now seldom if ever resorted to (h), the remedy at common law or under other statutes being simpler and more extensive. For the interpretation of the old statutes, see 1 Hawk. c. 69; Bac. Abr. tit. 'Perjury' (B); 2 Hale, 191, 192; 2 Rolle Abr. 77.

SECT. III.—SUBORNATION OF PERJURY.

Subornation of perjury is a misdemeanor indictable at common law (i), and is punishable in the same manner as perjury (j). It consists in procuring a man to take a false oath amounting to perjury, who actually takes such oath (k). The offence is in substance the same as counselling or procuring the commission of the misdemeanor of perjury, and is punishable in the same manner as the principal offence under sect. 8 of the Accessories, &c., Act, 1861 (l).

From the definition of the offence it follows that to justify conviction it must be proved that the perjury was committed and was due to the procurement. The proof cannot be made by putting in the record or certificate of the conviction of the perjury (l).

As to the form of the indictment, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 21, ante, p. 482. A suborner may be indicted and tried with the perjurer, and more than one person may be included in the same indictment for subornation (m).

If the person incited to take such an oath does not actually take it, the person by whom he was so incited is not guilty of subornation of perjury, but is guilty of an indictable misdemeanor (n), and is liable to be punished by fine and (or) imprisonment (o).

An indictment charged that the defendant, an attorney, being retained to defend W. against a charge of picking L.'s pocket, deceitfully procured himself to be employed by L., and persuaded L. to swear before the grand jury that he did not know who picked his pocket, which he did, and no bill was returned. An objection was made that L.'s evidence was not stated to have been false; but, upon a case reserved, the judges thought it unnecessary, as the defendant's crime was the same, unless he knew L.'s evidence to be true, and that he should have proved (p).

SECT. IV.—FALSE OATHS NOT AMOUNTING TO PERJURY.

It has already been stated, ante, p. 460, that false oaths (q) in merely private matters are not punishable as perjury, e.g., oaths in making a bargain (r).

In some cases, relating to matters of public concern, where a false oath has been taken, the party may be prosecuted by indictment at common law, though the offence may not amount to perjury. Thus it appears to have been held that any person making or knowingly using any false affidavit taken abroad (though perjury could not be assigned on it here), in order to mislead our Courts of justice, is punishable as a misdemeanor (s); and Ellenborough, C.J., said, 'that he had not the least doubt that any person making use of a false instrument in order to pervert the course of justice was guilty of an offence punishable by indictment' (t).

And though a master extraordinary in Chancery had no authority to administer an oath in matters in the Court of Admiralty, a person who made before him an affidavit, with a view to its being received by the Court of Admiralty, knowing at the same time it was false, was held guilty of a misdemeanor at common law (u).

The indictment stated that the prisoner, being minded to procure a marriage between himself and A. B., went before a surrogate, and was sworn to an affidavit in writing, that the said A. B. had been residing four weeks in the parish of S., whereas she had not, and so he had committed perjury; and the indictment had all apt allegations of an indictment for perjury. On a case reserved it was held that perjury could not be assigned upon an oath before a surrogate, and that as the indictment did not charge that the defendant took the oath to procure a licence, or that he did procure one, no punishment could be inflicted (v).

Where the false oath is taken under circumstances not amounting to perjury at common law, or by statute, the taking is an indictable misdemeanor if done to deceive a public officer, whereby a matter required by law for the accomplishment of an act of a public nature is illegally obtained. In R. v. Chapman (w), the third count of the indictment stated that W. J. was a surrogate having authority to grant licences for marriages, and that the defendant applied to the said W. J. to grant a licence for the solemnization of a marriage between J. B. and S. F., and that the defendant, unlawfully intending to obtain such licence for the said marriage in fraud of the Marriage Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 76), for the purpose of obtaining such licence, before the said W. J. as such surrogate (he the said W. J. having competent authority (x)), as such surrogate, to administer the said oath) did, for the purpose of thereby obtaining such licence for the marriage of the said J. B. and S. F., falsely corruptly, &c., swear, &c., that the name of him, the defendant, was J. B., and that he was one of the parties for whose marriage a licence was then applied for, and that he was a yeoman and widower, and that the said S. F. had had her usual place of abode within the parish of W. in the county of S. for the space of fifteen days then last past. (The count then negatived the matter sworn in the usual manner.) By means of which false oath the defendant did then obtain from the said W. J., so being such surrogate, a licence for the solemnization of a marriage between the said J. B. and S. F. The prisoner having been convicted, upon a case reserved, it was contended (1) that this count charged no offence; (2) that a surrogate had no authority to administer an oath, and at all events not this oath, to the defendant; (3) that the count did not aver that a written licence was obtained, or the marriage celebrated by means of such licence. The Court for Crown Cases Reserved affirmed the conviction, holding that the count charged a misdemeanor, as it distinctly averred that the prisoner swore falsely as to S. F.; and any one material fact falsely sworn to was sufficient to support the charge. Then the only question was as to the surrogate's power to administer the oath; not such an oath as would support an indictment for perjury, but as would make a party guilty of a misdemeanor. By the canon law the surrogate had such power (y), and the Marriage Act, 1823, assumed that he was the proper person to administer the oath (z). To make a false oath in order to procure a marriage licence from an officer empowered to grant such licence was a misdemeanor, because it was a step toward the accomplishment of a misdemeanor. The actual celebration of the marriage was immaterial. Anything essentially connected with marriage was a matter of public concern, so that any step towards its unlawful accomplishment was a misdemeanor (zz).

In R. v. Hodgkiss (a), the prisoner was indicted for wilful and corrupt perjury in making a false affidavit before a commissioner for taking oaths in the Court of Queen's Bench, for the purpose of getting a bill of sale filed under the Bills of Sale Act, 1854 (b). the words describing the offence as perjury, and held that without those words the indictment sufficiently stated a common law misdemeanor, in taking a false oath for which the defendant could be properly convicted, and was liable to the appropriate common law punishment (c).

In the Official Index to the Statutes will be found the numerous enactments punishing as perjury or as a misdemeanor the making of false statements on oath for matters of public concern, e.g., on registering a bill of sale (d), or a document of title to land (e), or a marriage (f), or for the purpose of elections (g).

SECT. V.—FABRICATION OF EVIDENCE.

Steps taken for the manufacture or fabrication of false evidence may be indicted as attempts to commit the misdemeanor of perverting the course of justice. In R. v. Vreones (h) the defendant was tried and convicted upon a count of an indictment alleging in substance: That by the terms of a contract for the purchase of a cargo of wheat, it was provided that any dispute arising under the contract should be referred to two arbitrators, whose award should be final and conclusive, that the defendant was appointed by the sellers to take samples of the cargo upon the arrival of the ship; that such samples were then taken and placed in bags sealed with the seals of the buyer and seller of the cargo, in accordance with the custom of merchants at the port, and for the purpose of being used as evidence before the arbitrators; that the defendant afterwards, intending to deceive the arbitrators to be appointed under the contract and wrongfully to make it appear to them that the bulk of the cargo was of better quality than it really was, so as to pervert the due course of law and justice, unlawfully and designedly removed the contents of the sealed bags and altered their character, and returned to the bags a quantity of wheat in a different condition, and altered in character and value, with intent thereby to pass the same off as true and genuine samples of the bulk of the cargo; and that afterwards the defendant forwarded the samples so altered to the London Corn Trade Association, with intent that the same should be used as evidence before such arbitrators, and thereby to injure and prejudice the buyer, and to pervert the due course of law and justice. The samples were not in fact used. But on a case reserved after conviction the Court held that the indictment aptly described an attempt to pervert justice, and that arbitrators must be considered as administering public justice (i). Under sect. 192 of the India Penal Code, fabrication of false evidence is punishable as a substantive offence (j).

(c) The only authority cited was R. v. Foster, ante, p. 528. Martin, B., said (L. R. 1 C. C. R. 213) that what was there held was that no punishment could be inflicted, because the indictment did not state facts sufficient to constitute the offence of taking a false oath.

SECT. VI.—OF FALSE STATUTORY DECLARATIONS.

This section deals with those solemn declarations which are not, strictly speaking, made on judicial proceedings, but are for the verification of certain matters of public or private concern. The term statutory declaration when found in an Act of Parliament means, unless a contrary intention appears, a declaration made by virtue of the Statutory Declarations Act, 1835 (k). That Act (5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 62), 'An Act . . . to make provision for the abolition of unnecessary oaths,' by sect. 2 enacts, 'that in any case where, by any Act or Acts made or to be made relating to the revenues of customs or excise, the post-office, the office of stamps and taxes, the office of woods and forests, land revenues, works, and buildings, the war-office, the army pay-office, the office of the treasurer of the navy, the accountant-general of the navy, or the ordnance, His Majesty's treasury, Chelsea hospital, Greenwich hospital, the Board of Trade, or any of the offices of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state, the India board, the office for auditing the public accounts, the national debt office, or any office under the control, direction, or superintendence of the treasury, or by any official regulation in any department, any oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit might, but for the passing of this Act, be required to be taken or made by any person on the doing of any act, matter, or thing, or for the purpose of verifying any book, entry, or return, or for any other purpose whatsoever, it shall be lawful for the treasury, if they shall so think fit, by writing under their hands and seals, to substitute a declaration to the same effect as the oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit which might, but for the passing of this Act, be required to be taken or made; and the person who might, under the Act or Acts imposing the same, be required to take or make such oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit, shall, in presence of the commissioners, collector, other officer, or person empowered by such Act or Acts to administer such oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit, make and subscribe such declaration, and every such commissioner, collector, other officer, or person is hereby empowered and required to administer the same accordingly' (l).

By sect. 3, the declaration so substituted is to be published in the Gazette, and after twenty-one days from the date of the Gazette the provisions of this Act are to apply (m).

Sect. 4. 'After the expiration of the said twenty-one days it shall not be lawful for any commissioner, collector, officer, or other person to administer or cause to be administered, or receive or cause to be received, any oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit, in the lieu of which such declaration as aforesaid shall have been directed by the treasury to be substituted.'

Sect. 5. 'If any person shall make and subscribe any such declaration as hereinbefore mentioned in lieu of any oath, solemn affirmation, (k) Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 21.

(l) The power given by this section is preserved by s. 14 (9) of the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 72).

(m) Orders were made in 1835 and 1836, which are printed in Stat. R. & O. Revised (ed. 1904), vol. xi. tit. 'Statutory Declaration.'

or affidavit, by any Act or Acts relating to the revenues of customs (n), or excise (o), stamps and taxes (p), or post-office, required to be made on the doing of any act, matter, or thing, or for verifying any book, account, entry, or return, or for any purpose whatsoever, and shall wilfully make therein any false statements as to any material particular, the person making the same shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor' (q).

By sect. 7, 'Nothing in this Act contained shall extend to any oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit which now is or hereafter may be made or taken, or required to be made or taken in any judicial proceeding, in any court of justice, or in any proceeding for, or by way of summary conviction, before any justice or justices of the peace; but all such oaths, affirmations, and affidavits shall continue to be required and to be administered, taken and made as well, and in the same manner as if this Act had not been passed.'

Corporate bodies.—Sect. 8. 'It shall be lawful for the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and for all other bodies corporate and politic, and for all bodies now by law or statute, or by any valid usage, authorised to administer or receive any oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit, to make statutes, bye-laws, or orders authorising and directing the substitution of a declaration in lieu of any oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit now required to be taken or made: provided always that such statutes, bye-laws, or orders be otherwise duly made and passed according to the charter, laws, or regulations of the particular university, other body corporate and politic, or other body so authorised as aforesaid.'

Churchwardens.—Sect. 9. 'In future every person entering upon the office of churchwarden or sidesman, before beginning to discharge the duties thereof, shall, in lieu of such oath of office, make and subscribe, in the presence of the ordinary or other person before whom he would, but for the passing of this Act, be required to take such oath, a declaration that he will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of his office, and such ordinary or other person is hereby empowered and required to administer the same accordingly: provided always, that no churchwarden or sidesman shall in future be required to take any oath on quitting office, as has heretofore been practised.'

Local Authorities.—Sect. 10. 'In any case where, under any Act or Acts for making, maintaining, or regulating any highway, or any road, or any turnpike road, or for paving, lighting, watching, or improving any city, town, or place, or touching any trust relating thereto, any oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit might, but for the passing of this Act, be required to be taken or made by any person whomsoever, no such oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit, shall in future be required to be or be taken and made, but the person who might under the Act or Acts imposing the same being required to take or make such oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit, shall in lieu thereof, in the presence of the trustee, commissioner, or other persons before whom he might under such Act or Acts be required to take or make the same, make and subscribe a declaration to the same effect as such oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit, and such trustee, commissioner, or other person, is hereby empowered and required to administer and receive the same' (r).

Pawnbrokers.—Sect. 12. 'Where by any Act or Acts at the time in force for regulating the business of pawnbrokers, any oath, affirmation, or affidavit might, but for the passing of this Act, be required to be taken or made, the person who by or under such Act or Acts might be required to take or make such oath, affirmation, or affidavit, shall in lieu thereof make and subscribe a declaration to the same effect; and such declaration shall be made and subscribed at the same time, and on the same occasion, and in the presence of the same person or persons, as the oath, affirmation, or affidavit in lieu whereof it shall be made and subscribed would by the Act or Acts directing or requiring the same be directed or required to be taken or made; and all and every the enactments, provisions, and penalties contained in or imposed by any such Act or Acts, as to any oath, affirmation, or affidavit thereby directed or required to be taken or made, shall extend and apply to any declaration in lieu thereof, as well and in the same manner as if the same were herein expressly enacted with reference thereto' (s).

By the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 93), s. 29, 'If any person makes any false declaration under this Act, either as an applicant, or as identifying an applicant, knowing the same to be false, in any material particular, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to the punishment attaching by law to perjury' (t).

Bank of England.—By 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 62, s. 14, 'In any case in which it has been the usual practice of the Bank of England to receive affidavits on oath to prove the death of any proprietor of any stocks or funds transferable there, or to identify the person of any such proprietor, or to remove any other impediment to the transfer of any such stocks or funds, or relating to the loss, mutilation, or defacement of any bank-note or bank post bill, no such oath or affidavit shall in future be required to be taken or made, but in lieu thereof the person who might have been required to take or make such oath or affidavit shall make and subscribe a declaration to the same effect as such oath or affidavit.'

By sect. 15, declarations are substituted in lieu of the oaths required by 5 Geo. II. c. 7, 'An Act for the more easy recovery of debts in His Majesty's plantations and colonies in America' (v), and by 54 Geo. III. c. 15, 'An Act for the more easy recovery of debts in His Majesty's colony of New South Wales.'

Wills.—Sect. 16. 'It shall and may be lawful to and for any attesting witness to the execution of any will, or codicil, deed, or instrument in

In patent matters, a declaration is still required, which may be statutory or not, as from time to time prescribed by rules. 7 Edw. VII. c. 29, s. 77.

(v) 5 Geo. II. c. 7, was repealed in 1887 (S.L.R.), and the portions of 54 Geo. III. c. 15, to which s. 15 relates, were repealed as to all the King's dominions in 1892 (S.L.R.). S. 15 was repealed as to Victoria in 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 12, s. 1).

Crown Suits in Colonies.—Sect. 17. ‘In all suits now depending or hereafter to be brought in any Court of law or equity by or in behalf of His Majesty, his heirs and successors, in any of his said Majesty’s territories, plantations, colonies, possessions, or dependencies, for or relating to any debt or account, that His Majesty, his heirs and successors, shall and may prove his and their debts and accounts, and examine his or their witness or witnesses by declaration, in like manner as any subject or subjects is or are empowered or may do by this present Act’ (w).

Writings generally.—Sect. 18, reciting that ‘it may be necessary and proper in many cases not herein specified, to require confirmation of written instruments or allegations, or proof of debts, or of the execution of deeds or other matters,’ enacts that ‘it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace, notary public, or other officer now by law authorised to administer an oath (x), to take and receive the declaration of any person voluntarily making the same before him in the form in the schedule to this Act annexed; and if any declaration so made shall be false or untrue in any material particular, the person wilfully making such false declaration shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor’ (y).

Punishment.—Sect. 21. ‘In any case where a declaration is substituted for an oath under the authority of this Act, or by virtue of any power or authority hereby given, or is directed and authorised to be made and subscribed under the authority of this Act, or by virtue of any power hereby given, any person who shall wilfully and corruptly make and subscribe any such declaration, knowing the same to be untrue in any material particular, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor’ (z).

The prisoner was indicted under 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 62, s. 12(a), for having at S., in the county of G., made a false declaration before E. G. H., a justice of the peace, that he had lost a pawnbroker’s ticket. It was stated in the opening of the case that the prisoner told the pawnbroker that he had lost the ticket, and the pawnbroker told him that he must make a declaration of the loss before a magistrate, and for that purpose handed the prisoner a copy of the ticket and a form, to be filled up according to the Act; the prisoner paid for the form, saying he would

(w) This section was repealed as to Victoria in 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 12, s. 1), and by s. 2 power was given to colonial legislatures to repeal, alter, or amend the sections, so far as applicable to the colony or possession.

(y) See ante, p. 249, for the punishment. By s. 19, the same fees are payable on declarations as on the oaths in lieu of which they are made. By s. 19, as modified by

s. 68 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), the declaration is to be in the form following:—‘I, A. B., do solemnly and sincerely declare, that and I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the provisions of the Statutory Declarations Act, 1835.’

go to a magistrate; he returned the same day with the form properly filled up, and with his name and that of Mr. H. attached. Mr. H. was not able to recollect the fact of the declaration having been made, and therefore was not present; but the pawnbroker identified the declaration. But there was only one witness to prove that the prisoner had not lost the duplicate. Platt, B.: 'As regards the proof of the declaration having been made by the prisoner, I think there may be sufficient evidence to support the indictment, if you can bring home to him a knowledge of its contents (b); but I am of opinion that the falsity of that declaration must be proved by the oaths of two witnesses as in a case of perjury, otherwise there would be but oath against oath.'

In R. v. Morgan (c) the defendant was indicted under the 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 62, s. 12, for making a false declaration before a justice for the borough of Liverpool that she had lost the pawn ticket of certain goods pledged by her. The clerk to the justice could only speak to the handwriting of the justice on the declaration, and, from the great number of these declarations, he could not remember when or where it was made. It was contended that there was no evidence that the declaration had been made before the justice acting as such or even within the borough; and Gurney, B., held that the objection was good, and that the justice if called might at all events have proved that he had never taken such a declaration out of the borough. No authority was cited, and it is submitted that in view of the authorities above cited the ruling was wrong.

For other false declarations without oath made punishable as perjury or misdemeanor, see Chronological Table of the Statutes, tit. 'Perjury' (d).

Courts of Quarter Sessions have no jurisdiction to try indictments for making or suborning another to make a false affirmation or declaration punishable as a misdemeanor (e).

Where a prisoner was indicted for making a false declaration before a justice in pursuance of the rules of a benefit society, which required a loss by fire in certain cases to be verified by such a declaration; it was objected that sect. 18 of the Act of 1835 did not extend to any declarations except those mentioned in the preamble of that section; but Erskine, J., held that the section extended to all declarations generally (f).

The prisoner was indicted for making a false declaration under sect. 18, said: 'The Courts always give credence to the signature of the magistrate or commissioner; and if his signature to the jurat is proved, that is sufficient evidence that the party was duly sworn, and if the place at which it was sworn is mentioned in the jurat, that is sufficient evidence that it was sworn at that place.' And see R. v. James, and Brickell v. Hulse, ante, p. 522, and R. v. Westley, Bell, 193, ante, p. 524.

(b) R. v. Browning, 3 Cox, 437. The ruling of the learned Baron was right on both points; though an idle doubt has been raised on the first point. If a man in writing admitted that he had made a declaration before a justice under the Act, no doubt can exist that such writing would be sufficient evidence against him; and in this case the prisoner produced a declaration in the form under the Act, signed by himself and the justice, and dealt with it, and obtained the goods by it, as a valid declaration; and it is perfectly clear that this was abundant evidence that he had made that declaration in the manner and with the formalities described in it. In R. v. Spencer, 1 C. & P. 260, ante, p. 520, Tenterden, C.J.,

that he had done no act to encumber certain lands, and that he was in possession of those lands, and in receipt of the rents and profits thereof. The declaration was duly made in support of an application to a building society in 1861, for an advance of £150. The mortgage deed of 1861 to the building society was produced, but the attesting witness was not called to prove it. The original conveyance of the property to the prisoner was put in. It was objected that the declaration was confirmatory of the mortgage deed, and as that was not proved, it was not shewn that the matter sworn was material. It was answered that the declaration was made to confirm the original conveyance, and not the mortgage, which was executed after the declaration. Byles, J.: 'I am of opinion that the objection is fatal. The preamble of 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 62, s. 18 (g), must be read with the enacting part; and as the deed, which rendered the declaration necessary, is not proved, this indictment cannot be sustained' (h).

An indictment alleged that the prisoner was a member of a benefit society, the rules of which were duly certified, and a transcript of them filed with the clerk of the peace, and that by a rule of the society it was provided that if any free member should have his property destroyed by fire, he should produce a certificate, and if the property was not insured the society would indemnify him to a certain amount if the claim were authenticated by a solemn declaration before a magistrate, and then charged the prisoner with making a false declaration before a magistrate contrary to sect. 18 of the Statutory Declaration Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 62), that he had sustained a loss by fire. In order to prove the rules of the society a copy of the rules was produced, and the 24th rule, which was applicable to the allegations in the indictment, was proved to have been examined with the transcript at the clerk of the peace's office; but no other rule had been so examined; and Erskine, J., held that all the rules ought to have been compared. To prove the rules, either the original transcript should have been produced, or an examined copy of the whole of it. It was then objected that the indictment was not proved. But Erskine, J., held that all the statements in the indictment with reference to the society might be rejected as surplusage, if there was enough on the face of the indictment to shew that an offence was committed without any reference to the society or its rules, which appeared to be the case. The making of the declaration was then proved, and it referred to the certificate, which was put in; and Erskine, J., allowed the persons whose names purported to be signed to it, to prove that their names were forgeries, as it might go to shew that the declaration was wilfully false (i).

Of Perjury.

Judicial Proceeding.—An examination for discovery is a “judicial proceeding” as defined by this section, but the Court has a discretion to refuse to hear a charge of perjury alleged in respect of civil proceedings while such proceedings are pending. R. v. Thickens (1906), 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 274.

An examination ordered by a Judge to be held before the registrar of the Court in a civil proceeding ceased to be a “judicial proceeding” under the Criminal Code secs. 170 and 171 as to the offence of perjury, when the examiner after swearing the witness leaves the room in which the examination is being held, although the official stenographer took the depositions in presence of counsel for the parties.

A false statement under oath so made in the absence of the official examiner cannot be made the foundation of a perjury charge. The King v. Rulofson, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 253.

False Oath before De Facto Legal Tribunal.—It is perjury under the Code to give false testimony before a justice of the peace holding a judicial proceeding under a provincial law, although the justice was by the terms of that law disqualified from hearing the charge because he was not a resident of the county in which the alleged offence took place. Drew v. The King, 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 424, 33 Can. S.C.R. 228, affirming Drew v. The King, 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 241.

Materiality.—Under the Code, the giving of false evidence constitutes perjury, whether such evidence is material or not, if the false assertion were known to such witness to be false, and intended by the witness to mislead the Court, jury or person holding the proceeding.

Statutory Declaration.—A false statement, made in a statutory declaration, administered under the “Canada Evidence Act,” may be the subject of a charge akin to perjury under Code sec. 175, for the object of sec. 36 of the Evidence Act was to provide a means whereby certain statements not authorized to be made on oath could be verified.

At Common Law.—It has always been an offence at common law for a competent witness upon oath in a judicial proceeding before a Court of competent jurisdiction, to give evidence material to the issue, which he believes to be false. The common law, however, stopped there and took no notice of false statements, whether made upon oath or not, made under other conditions. The perjury had also to be in a judicial proceeding before a competent tribunal. R. v. Row (1864), 14 U.C.C.P. 307. And it was, therefore, formerly the law that false evidence given upon an examination in the absence of the authority competent to hold such examination was not perjury. R. v. Gibson, 7 Revue Legale (Que.) 573.

Perjury, etc.—It is not an essential that an information for perjury should set out the exact words of the false statement in testimony taken viva voce, the charge may be properly stated by summarizing what was in effect the false evidence, specifying the tribunal and the time and place at which the same was given, and charging that thereby the accused “unlawfully committed perjury.” R. v. Legros, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 161.

Intent to Mislead.—Although an “intent to mislead” is an essential ingredient of the offence, a charge which does not specifically allege such intent may be sufficient if it gives to the accused notice that he is charged with having "falsely, wilfully and corruptly" sworn to, or solemnly declared a statement to the effect and in the words set forth. R. v. Skelton (1898), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 467, 2 N.W.T. Rep. 210, 215; R. v. Dewar, 2 N.W.T. Rep. 194, Cr. Code sec. 852(3).

Joint Affidavit.—A joint affidavit made by the defendant and one D. stated: "Each for himself maketh oath and saith that he this deponent is not aware of any adverse claim to or occupation of said lot." The defendant having been convicted of perjury on this latter allegation, it was held that there was neither ambiguity or doubt in what each defendant said, but that each in substance stated that he was not aware of any adverse claim to or occupation of said lot. R. v. Atkinson (1866), 17 U.C.C.P. 295. And it has been held that a statutory declaration made jointly by several persons that they know certain alleged facts is to be construed as a statement by each of them severally that he knows the matters alleged. R. v. Skelton (1898), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 467 (N.W.T.).

Several Charges on One Affidavit.—Upon a "speedy trial" upon several charges of perjury in respect of one affidavit, the trial Judge is bound to regard the whole affidavit as the sworn statement in respect of each charge, and should not treat each paragraph of the affidavit as an entire statement independently of the other paragraphs. The King v. Cohon, 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 386.

Oath to Voter.—A person applying for a ballot at a Dominion election in the name of another person entitled to vote may be convicted of perjury in taking the oath of identity with that person, although the Elections Act authorizes the administration of the oath of qualification to an "elector" only, and that term must be held to include, for the purposes of administering such oath and prosecuting the personator, the person representing himself at the polls as an elector. R. v. Chamberlain, 10 Man. R. 261.

Declaration Under Provincial Law.—Perjury is not proved in respect of a solemn declaration that there was "no lawful hindrance" to deponent's proposed marriage by shewing that the deponent knew the girl to be under twenty-one and that her parent's consent had not been obtained as required by the provincial law, if the marriage was valid notwithstanding the absence of such consent. The King v. Moraes (1907), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 145.

Warrant of Arrest.—A warrant of arrest for perjury is sufficient under Code sec. 1152 if it charges that the accused committed perjury by swearing that he did not do a particular act specified without alleging therein that the statement was sworn with intent to mislead the Court. R. v. Lee Chu, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 322.

Indictment.—An indictment or charge for perjury in which it is alleged that the accused committed perjury by falsely, wilfully and with intent to mislead the magistrate, swearing to a certain statement, involves a charge that the accused knew such statement to be false and will not be quashed for failure to more specifically charge such knowledge. R. v. Doyle (1906), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 69.

Where the statutory form of indictment is not followed but the indictment contains all the averments which the statute requires, the addition of other unnecessary averments does not invalidate it. R. v. Coote (1903), 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 199, 10 B.C.R. 285.

In R. v. Cohon (1903), 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 386, the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia held that a charge of perjury is defective as not disclosing a crime, if it does not allege that the statement was sworn to knowing the same to be false, or if such is not the necessary inference from what is alleged, apart from the declaration in the charge that the accused "thereby committed wilful and corrupt perjury."

But the decision of the Cohon Case is in conflict with the Quebec decisions under the statute preceding the Code. It has been held in the latter province that an indictment following the statutory form is sufficient if it charges that the accused "committed perjury" by swearing that (specifying the false oath), without including a specific statement that it was so done knowing the same to be false. R. v. Bain (1877), Ramsay's Cases (Que.) 192; R. v. Bownes, Ramsay's Cases (Que.) 192. See sec. 862 as to statements now unnecessary in counts for perjury.

Where a prosecutor has been bound by recognizance to prosecute and give evidence against a person charged with perjury in the evidence given by him on the trial of a certain suit, and the grand jury has found an indictment against the defendant, the Court will not quash the indictment because there is a variance in the specific charge of perjury contained in the information and that contained in the indictment, provided the indictment sets forth the substantial charge contained in the information. R. v. Broad (1864), 14 U.C.C.P. 168; and see secs. 852-855.

A count charging the accused with having committed perjury at an inquest before a coroner is not invalid by reason of the fact that the tribunal was a coroner and a jury. R. v. Thompson (1896), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 265, 2 Terr. L.R. 383.

Evidence.—D. being charged with perjury, in the assignments of perjury and in the negative averments certain facts sworn to by D. in answering to faits et articles on the contestation of a saisie arrêt or attachment were distinctly negatived, in the terms in which they were made. It was held that under the general terms of the negative averments it was competent for the prosecution to prove special facts to establish the falsity of the answers given by D. in his answers on faits et articles, and the conviction could not be set aside because of the admission of such proof. Downie v. R. (1888), 15 S.C.R. 358.

In a prosecution for perjury where it appears that the false oath was taken before a justice receiving the complaint of an offence committed within his jurisdiction, and acting in the matter within his jurisdiction, it is unnecessary to offer further evidence that he had authority to administer an oath. R. v. Callaghan (1860), 19 U.C.Q.B. 364.

A charge of perjury cannot be sustained against a boy under fourteen without proof of guilty knowledge of wrong-doing. Code sec. 18 has not changed the common law which presumed against guilty knowledge where the accused was under the age of fourteen. The King v. Carvery, 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 331.

It is not essential to the offence of perjury that the notary or other official should have uttered the words of obligation in administering the oath; such words used by the deponent and accompanied by a request that the affidavit already signed by the deponent should be certified as sworn, will be sufficient. Re Collins (No. 2), 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 73.

A plea of autrefois acquit to a charge of perjury in taking the oath of identity at a polling booth is not supported by a record of acquittal on a charge of personating an elector at the same time and place, although the oath of identity and the alleged personation were in regard to the same elector. A verdict for personation could not have been received under an indictment for perjury in taking the oath of identity, although the facts constituting personation must necessarily be shewn in order to prove the perjury. The King v. Quinn, 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 412.

Proof of Judicial Proceedings.—Canada Evidence Act, secs. 23, 28(2), 34, 35.

On a charge of perjury committed at the trial of an indictment such trial and the indictment, verdict, and judgment therein must be proved as matters of record. Such proof may be given either by the production of the original record or of an exemplification thereof, or by a certificate under Code sec. 979 of the substance and effect of the indictment and trial. The vivâ voce testimony of the clerk of assize and of the official stenographer with the production of the official book of entry in which the clerk recorded his memoranda of the proceedings and of the stenographer's notes of the evidence, are insufficient as legal proof of the fact of the former trial. Where a conviction has been made without the legal proof required by law of an essential part of the crime, such defect is a "substantial wrong or miscarriage at the trial" and the conviction must be set aside. The King v. Drummond, 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 340, 10 O.L.R. 456.

Upon a charge of perjury in respect of evidence taken by a magistrate on requiring securities to keep the peace under sec. 748(2) of the Code, the false statement may be proved by oral testimony, although not recorded in the minutes of evidence then made by the magistrate. R. v. Doyle (1906), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 69.

Corroboration is required on a charge of perjury. See sec. 1002 of the Code.

Where perjury is charged as having been committed on a summary trial for an indictable offence under the Code, the formal record of such summary trial must be proved in the perjury case, although the latter is tried summarily by the same magistrate.

A magistrate holding a summary trial for perjury alleged to have been committed in a former trial before himself, must not import into the perjury trial his recollection of the demeanour of the accused and other witnesses at the former trial; he must be guided solely by the evidence of the perjury trial considered in view of the demeanour of the witnesses thereat. R. v. Legros, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 161.

Trial by Police Magistrate.—A police magistrate in Ontario has jurisdiction with the consent of the accused to try the offence of perjury. R. v. Burns (No. 2) (1901), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 330 (Ont.); and by sub-sec. (2) of sec. 777, police magistrates of cities and incorporated towns in every other part of Canada have the like jurisdiction.

Perjury in Pending Civil Action.—Where a charge of perjury is brought on for trial during the pendency of the civil action in which it is alleged to have been committed and where the question of fact on which the perjury is alleged is the same as that involved in the civil action, the Criminal Court should exercise its discretion to postpone the criminal trial until after judgment in the civil action. The King v. Cohon, 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 386.

A person charged with perjury committed in a civil action is entitled to have put in evidence those parts of his testimony in the civil action which may explain or qualify the statements in respect of which the perjury is charged. R. v. Coote (1903), 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 199, 10 B.C.R. 285.

But the non-production by the prosecution, on a trial for perjury, of the plea which was filed in the civil suit wherein the defendant is alleged to have given false testimony, is not material when the assignment of perjury has no reference to the pleading, but the defendant may, if he wishes, in case the plea is not produced, prove its contents by secondary evidence. R. v. Ross, 1 Montreal L.R. (Q.B.) 227, 28 L.C.J. 261.

The permission granted by the Canada Evidence Act to certain officials to "receive" the solemn declarations of persons voluntarily making the same in the statutory form includes an authorization to the declarant to make the same, and constitutes him a person "authorized by law to make a solemn declaration.” R. v. Skelton (1898), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 467 (N.W.T.).

Section 176 does not refer to solemn declarations under the Canada Evidence Act but merely to statements and declarations; the former are covered by sec. 175. It is only in certain cases that statements and declarations other than solemn declarations are specially authorized, and sec. 176 appears to be applicable only to such cases. Ibid.

Section 1002 of the Criminal Code 1906, which requires corroboration in certain cases, and specially includes the offence of perjury under Code sec. 174, does not apply to the analogous offence of making a false statutory declaration under sec. 175.

A person is “authorized by law” to make a statutory declaration if the declaration is such as can legally be made under the Canada Evidence Act.

On a charge of making a false statutory declaration, it must be shewn that when the declaration was made the officer receiving the same or the declarant made use of words to the effect that the declaration was in the nature of an oath.

Where a form of statutory declaration was made up by a magistrate from information given by the accused, and after the latter’s signature had been obtained the magistrate addressed the accused with the words: “Do you declare it is true?” to which the accused replied, “I do,” the declaration has not been legally made in the terms of the Canada Evidence Act and a conviction is not authorized under Code sec. 175, although the allegations in the document are shewn to be wilfully false. Rex v. Phillips, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 239.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF IMPUGNING OBSTRUCTING DEFEATING AND PERVERTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.SECT. I.—OF CONTEMPT OF COURT AND ATTACKS ON THE ACTION OF JUDGES AND JURIES.

CONTEMPTS against the superior Courts or their judges (a), and scandalous reflections upon their proceedings (b), ('scandalising the court') (c), have always been considered criminal; and one of the earliest cases of criminal prosecution for libel appears to have been an indictment for an offence of this kind (d).

Generally, any contemptuous or contumacious words spoken to the judges of any Court in the execution of their offices are indictable; and when disparaging words are spoken of the judges of the superior Courts, the speaker is indictable at common law, whether the words relate to their office or not (e). But where the aspersions on the judge do not relate to his judicial conduct, it is now usual to leave him to his ordinary remedies for defamation (f). Attempts to intimidate or unduly influence a judge appear to be indictable misdemeanors (g). Public attacks on Courts of justice have in some instances been treated as a form of sedition (h).

It is now accepted law that it is a misdemeanor to publish invectives or improper attacks on judges or juries, reflecting upon and calumniating their action in the administration of justice (i).

An order made by a corporation, and entered in their books, stating that A. (against whom a jury had found a verdict with large damages in an action for a malicious prosecution, and which verdict had been confirmed in the Court of Common Pleas), was actuated by motives of public justice in preferring the indictment, was held to be a libel reflecting on the administration of justice, for which an information should be granted against the members who had made the order. Ashhurst, J., said, that the assertion that A. was actuated by motives of public justice carried with it an imputation on the public justice of the country; for if those were his only motives, then the verdict must be wrong. Buller, J., said: 'Nothing can be of greater importance to the welfare of the public than to put a stop to the animadversions and censures which are so frequently made on Courts of justice in this country. They can be of no service, and may be attended with the most mischievous consequences. Cases may happen in which the judge and jury may be mistaken: when they are, the law has afforded a remedy; and the party injured is entitled to pursue every method which the law allows to correct the mistake. But when a person has recourse either by a writing like the present, by publications in print, or by any other means, to calumniate the proceedings of a Court of justice, the obvious tendency of it is to weaken the administration of justice, and in consequence to sap the very foundation of the constitution itself' (j).

In R. v. White (k) an information had been filed against the proprietors and printers of a Sunday newspaper for a libel upon Le Blanc, J., and a jury, by whom a prisoner had been tried for murder and acquitted. It was contended on the part of the defendants that they had only made a fair use of their right to comment on the proceedings of a Court of justice. Grose, J., said that 'it certainly was lawful, with decency and candour, to discuss the propriety of the verdict of a jury, or the decisions of a judge; and if the defendants should be thought to have done no more in this instance, they would be entitled to an acquittal: but, on the contrary, they had transgressed the law, and ought to be convicted, if the extracts from the newspaper, set out in the information, contained no reasoning or discussion, but only the declamation and invective, and were written not with a view to elucidate the truth, but to injure the characters of individuals, and to bring into hatred and contempt the administration of justice in the country.'

This doctrine is now fully accepted, and 'when a trial has taken place and the case is over, the judge or jury are given over to criticism' (l); but this liberty does not license personal scurrilous abuse of the judge as a judge (m).

Offences within this section, if committed with reference to judges of a superior Court, may be dealt with as for contempt of Court (n).

The rule as to the criminality of attacks or aspersions on a judge in his judicial capacity was originally applied only to the King's judges of the superior Courts. This expression includes the House of Lords, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the Courts of Appeal Civil and Criminal, and every branch and judge of the High Court of Justice in England and Ireland (o) and superior colonial Courts of record (p). The rule has been extended to justices of the peace and judges of inferior Courts while acting in the execution of their office. In such cases the remedy is not by summary proceedings for contempt, but by indictment or criminal information (q).

An indictment does not lie for contemptuous words spoken either of or to inferior magistrates, unless they are at the time in the actual execution of their duty, or at least unless the words affect them directly in their office though it may be good cause for binding the offender to his good behaviour (r). Where the defendant was indicted for saying of a justice of the peace for the county of Middlesex, in his absence, that he was a scoundrel and a liar (s), Ellenborough, C.J., said: 'The words not being spoken to the justice, I think they are not indictable. This doctrine is laid down by Holt in a case in Salkeld (t); and in R. v. Pocock (u) the Court of Queen's Bench refused to grant an information for saying of a justice, in his absence, that he was a forsworn rogue. However, I will not direct an acquittal upon this point, as it is upon the record, and may be taken advantage of in arrest of judgment. It will be for the jury now to say whether these words were spoken of the prosecutor as a justice of the peace, and with intent to defame him in that capacity; for if they were not, this indictment is not supported; and it could not by possibility be a misdemeanor to utter them, although the prosecutor's name may be in the commission of the peace for the county of Middlesex' (v). But it has been held to be an indictable offence to say of a justice of the peace, when in the execution of his office, 'you are a rogue and a liar' (w). The Court will not, however, grant an information for calling a magistrate a liar, accusing him of misconduct in having absented himself from an election of clerk to the magistrates, and threatening a repetition of the same language whenever such magistrate came into the town, unless they tend to a breach of the peace (x).

Offences of this kind, though in theory indictable, are dealt with summarily by the High Court when directed against any of its divisions (y), and may be dealt with summarily by an inferior Court of record if committed in facie curiæ. The proceeding in the High Court is by attachment or committal (z). The remedy by indictment is rarely used, owing to the inevitable delay and consequent risk of interference with justice (a).

SECT. II.—OF ACTS AFFECTING FAIR TRIAL OF PENDING CASES.

Any publication, exhibition, or representation intended or calculated to interfere with the fair trial of a legal proceeding pending in any Court of justice, is a misdemeanor at common law (b). The incriminated publication or exhibition may be described as attempts to pervert the course of justice, or as calculated to produce that effect (c).

This rule has been held to apply to a theatrical representation which represented a man in the act of committing an offence for which he was awaiting trial (d).

So has the circulation by the defendant to an information immediately before its trial, and in the town where the trial was to be held of a vindication of his conduct and an attack on that of the prosecutor (e). and the publication of proceedings before a coroner with comments before the completion of the inquiry (f); and the publication of newspaper articles containing statements affecting the character or conduct of persons under accusation of crime, whatever the stage which the proceedings have reached, i.e. whether during a preliminary inquiry before justices, or after committal, or during trial or indictment (g). In R. v. Tibbits and Windust (h) the editor and reporter of a weekly paper were indicted and held to have been rightly convicted of publishing articles by a 'Special Crime Investigator' containing a number of statements highly detrimental of two persons under an accusation of attempted murder. Of the statements some were published during the preliminary inquiry, some between committal and trial, and some during the actual trial at the assizes. Where the publication relates to a case which is actually only pending before justices of the peace, but in the due course of justice may go for trial before any branch of the High Court, including a Court of assize (i), or the Central Criminal Court (j), the offence may be dealt with by the High Court summarily by attachment for contempt, whether the publication is by an individual or by a corporation (k). The offence is committed if the publication is calculated to interfere with a fair trial, should the result of the preliminary inquiry be the committal of the prisoner for trial (l). It would seem that even where the trial will take place at Quarter Sessions or in any inferior Court, the High Court may intervene brevi manu to punish publications calculated to prejudice such trial (m).

SECT. III.—OF INTERFERENCE WITH WITNESSES.

It is an offence at common law to use threats or persuasion to witnesses to induce them not to appear or give evidence in courts of justice, even if the threats or persuasion fail (n). The offence is a misdemeanor punishable by fine and (or) imprisonment without hard labour, on indictment or information; or, if committed with reference to a case in a superior Court of record, by summary proceedings for contempt (o).

As to conspiracies to do any of these acts, see ante, p. 163. In R. v. Roderick and Clare (p) a conviction was obtained on an indictment for conspiracy to defeat the ends of justice by preventing a girl under sixteen from attending the assizes to give evidence against a man charged with a criminal offence against her.

There is no precedent of proceedings at common law for discharging or damnifying witnesses because of evidence given by them. But in the case of Parliamentary inquiries, witnesses are protected by the Witnesses Protection Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 64), sect. 1. 'In this Act the word "inquiry" shall mean any inquiry held under the authority of any Royal Commission or by any committee of either House of Parliament, or pursuant to any statutory authority, whether the evidence at such inquiry is or is not given on oath, but shall not include any inquiry by any Court of justice.'

By sect. 2, 'Every person who commits any of the following acts, that is to say, who threatens, or in any way punishes, damnifies, or injures, or attempts to punish, damnify, or injure any person for having given evidence upon any inquiry, or on account of the evidence which he has given upon any such inquiry, shall, unless such evidence was given in bad faith, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable upon conviction thereof to a maximum penalty of one hundred pounds, or to a maximum imprisonment of three months.'

By sect. 3, 'A prosecution for any offence under this Act may be heard and determined by a court of summary jurisdiction under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, provided that should either the complainant or the party charged object to the case being dealt with summarily, the Court shall send such cases for trial to the quarter sessions or assizes, or in cases arising within the metropolitan area to the Central Criminal Court.'

By sect. 4, 'It shall be lawful for any Court before which any person may be convicted of any offence under this Act, if it thinks fit, in addition to sentence or punishment by way of fine or imprisonment, to condemn such person to pay the whole or any part of the costs and expenses incurred in and about the prosecution and conviction for the offence of which he shall be convicted, and, upon the application of the complainant, and immediately after such conviction, to award to complainant any sum of money which it may think reasonable, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, by way of satisfaction or compensation for any loss of situation, wages, status, or other damnification or injury suffered by the complainant through or by means of the offence of which such person shall be so convicted, provided that where the case is tried before a jury, such jury shall determine what amount, if any, is to be paid by way of satisfaction or compensation.'

By sect. 5, 'The amount awarded for such satisfaction or compensation, together with such costs, to be taxed by the proper officer of the Court, shall be deemed a judgment debt due to the person entitled to receive the same from the person so convicted, and be recoverable accordingly.'

SECT. IV.—OF DISOBEYING JUDICIAL ORDERS.

A. General.

Wilful disobedience to the order of a competent Court is in certain cases punishable on indictment or summarily by fine and (or) imprisonment without hard labour. Disobedience by officers of the Court or executive officers to judicial orders will be dealt with under official misconduct (post, Book VIII., Chapter I.).

Disobedience by witnesses or parties to lawful orders of a superior Court of record may be dealt with by the Court summarily by committal or attachment for contempt of Court (q). Where the order is to pay money the jurisdiction to imprison for disobedience is limited by the Debtors Acts, 1869 and 1878 (r). The power is oftenest exercised with reference to persons who disobey injunctions, or who, knowing that an injunction has been made against another, aid and abet him in disobeying it (s). A distinction is drawn for purposes of appeal between disobedience to orders of the Court made to enforce a civil right, and those forms of contempt which are regarded as purely criminal, e.g., outside interference with the course of justice (t). Such offences can, it would seem, also be dealt with by indictment (u). There are few if any precedents of an indictment for disobeying the orders of a superior Court of record. It is said that where the treasurer of a county refuses to comply with an order for payment of the costs of prosecuting an indictment, the remedy is by

B. Disobedience of Orders made by Justices of the Peace.

Disobedience to an order of justices of the peace made in due exercise of their powers is a misdemeanor indictable at common law (x). It is immaterial whether the order of justices is made at general or quarter sessions (y), or at petty sessions (z), or out of sessions (a), provided that it is one which the justice or justices has jurisdiction to make, and that there is no prescribed and adequate remedy other than indictment for disobedience (b). Foster, J., thus stated the rule: 'In all cases where a justice has power given him to make an order, and direct it to an inferior ministerial officer, and he disobeys it, if there be no particular remedy prescribed, it is indictable' (c). Thus, a party has been held guilty of an indictable offence, in disobeying an order of sessions for the maintenance of his grandchildren (d). In this case it was contended that, as the Poor Law Act, 1601 (43 Eliz. c. 2), s. 7, had annexed a specific penalty, and a particular mode of proceeding, the course prescribed by the Act ought to have been adopted, and that there could be no proceeding by indictment: but it was held that the prosecutor was at liberty to proceed either at common law, or in the method prescribed by the statute; and that an indictment would lie at common law for disobedience to an order of sessions (e). And power to remove a pauper being given to two justices by 14 Car. II. c. 12, the not receiving him was held to be a disobedience of that statute for which an indictment would lie (f).

Where an order of justices is a nullity on the face of it, another order may be made, and an indictment will lie for disobeying the second order (g).

Where an order is made by justices, any person mentioned in it, and required to act under it, must, upon its being duly served upon him, lend his aid to carry it into effect. Thus where, upon a complaint made Ferrall*, 2 Den. 51, the question was whether, under a clause in the Annual Mutiny Act, a soldier was freed from an indictment for disobeying a bastardy order; and the Court held that he was not, as it was a 'criminal matter.' See now 44 & 45 Vict. c. 58, ss. 138, 145.

by an excluded member of a friendly society, two persons, A. and B., the then stewards of the society, were summoned, and an order made by two justices that such stewards and the other members of the society should forthwith reinstate the complainant; it was held that though this order was not served upon A. and B. until they had ceased to be stewards, yet it was still obligatory upon them, as members of the society, to attempt to reinstate the complainant; and that their having ceased to be stewards was no justification of entire neglect on their part (h). Ellenborough, C.J., said at the trial: 'The order is not confined to the stewards alone, but is made upon all the members of the society; and the defendants were members of the society independently of their being stewards, and were bound, as members, to see that the order was obeyed; or, at least, to have taken some steps for that purpose. As members, they might have done something; as stewards, indeed, they might, with greater facility, have enforced obedience to the order; but each member had it in his power to lend some aid for the attainment of that object.' And on a motion to enter the verdict for the defendants, on the ground that, having ceased to be stewards when the notice was served, they had not been guilty of a criminal default; the Court said, that if the defendants had shown that they did everything in their power to restore the party, in obedience to the order, they might have given it in evidence by way of excuse (i).

As a general rule there must be personal service of an order on all persons who are to be proceeded against for disobeying it, and the indictment should so state: and it has been held a fatal objection to an indictment for disobedience and contempt of an order of sessions, that it charged a contempt by six persons of an order, which was only stated to have been served on four of them (j).

The entire order of a Court to pay the expenses of a prosecution, under sect. 26 of the Criminal Law Act, 1826 (7 Geo. IV. c. 64), must be served on the treasurer of the county. Where, an order was made to pay an aggregate sum, the details of which were annexed, and the attorney tore off the details, and served the order for the payment of the aggregate sum alone on the treasurer; it was held, on a case reserved, that he was not indictable for refusing to obey the order (k).

An indictment for disobeying an order of justices must show explicitly that the order was made; and it is not sufficient to state the order by way of recital (l). It is said to be safer to aver that the defendant was requested to comply with the terms of the order (m).

(h) R. v. Gash, 1 Stark. (N. P.) 41. The Acts relating to friendly societies are consolidated by 59 & 60 Vict. cc. 25, 26.

(i) Id. ibid. The motion was also made on another ground; namely, a defect in the jurisdiction of the magistrates: two magistrates of the county of Middlesex, where the meetings of the society were held, having made the order, though the society had been originally established in the city of London, and its rules enrolled at the sessions for that city. But the Court decided that the magistrates of Middlesex had jurisdiction. See R. v. Wade, 1 B. & Ad. 861.

(m) 2 Chit. Cr. L. 279, note (g), citing R. v. Fearnley, 1 T. R. 316, where an objection was taken to an indictment that it did not contain such statement; but the Court did not find it necessary to give any opinion upon the point.

If the indictment omits to state the service of the order the want of such allegation will not be supplied by an averment that the defendant was requested to perform the duties required by the order (n). It seems not to be a matter for the prosecution to aver, but one for the defence to prove that the order has not been revoked (o).

An indictment for refusing to obey an order of justices to pay a church-rate, alleged that the rate 'was duly made as by law in that behalf required, and that the same was afterwards duly allowed as by law in that behalf required,' and that 'the defendant was duly rated' in and by the said rate at the sum of sixteen shillings. It was objected that the facts ought to have been stated which constituted a due making and allowance of the rate and a due rating of the defendant. But it was held (1), that these introductory facts were alleged only to shew that the justices had jurisdiction to make the order, and therefore they fell within the description of inducement, in which such a general allegation was allowed; (2) that the rest of the count shewed that the justices had sufficient authority to make the order, as there was a sufficient information by competent persons to give them jurisdiction (p). The same indictment stated that a church-rate had been duly demanded of the defendant, and that he had refused and neglected to pay the rate to W. A. and J. C., who then were the churchwardens; and it was held that, though it did not state that they were churchwardens when the rate was demanded, it was sufficient that they were shewn to be so at the time of neglect and refusal to pay the rate, for that was the offence (q). The same indictment alleged that a justice made his warrant (summons), whereby, 'after reciting as therein recited,' he summoned the defendant, and the indictment did not state to whom the warrant was directed. It was held that it was sufficient, for enough of the warrant was stated without mentioning the recital, and it was sufficiently averred that it was directed to the defendant (q). The same indictment averred that a summons was issued on May 30, to appear on June 6, then next, and was 'before the said 6th day of June, to wit, on the 30th of May' personally served on the defendant, who did not appear in pursuance of it; and it was held that it must be assumed that the justices satisfied themselves that it had been served a reasonable time before the day of appearance, otherwise they would have acted unjustly in making the order in the absence of the defendant, and the indictment is always favourable to the validity of an order (r). On the same indictment it was also held that it is not necessary to set out the order according to the tenor; it is enough to set out the substance of it correctly (s). The same indictment did not aver the church-rate to have been in force when the order to pay it was made, but it was held that, as it averred that the rate continued in force at the time of the indictment, it was quite sufficient (t). It was also held that the indictment need not allege the date of the order (u), as that was immaterial.

An indictment alleged that an appeal was made by the defendants against a rate to the sessions, who dismissed the appeal, and ordered the defendants 'immediately upon service of the said order, or a true copy thereof,' to pay the churchwardens and overseers a sum for costs of the appeal, and that a true copy of the said order was afterwards personally served upon each of the defendants, and each of them had notice of the said order. Nevertheless, the defendants wilfully neglected and refused to pay. Upon the trial the clerk of the peace produced the minutes of the sessions, and read the order, which ordered the defendants 'immediately upon service of this order, or a true copy thereof,' to pay the costs. The clerk of the peace stated that 'the costs were not taxed during the actual sitting of the sessions, but between the time of the Court adjourning and its meeting. I reported to the magistrates what I thought fit and proper costs; and the Court adopted it. I made a verbal statement, which the Court adopted. I gave both parties an opportunity of attending. The defendants did not attend. I wrote a letter to their solicitor. The appeal was dismissed for want of due notice.' The defendants' attorney was the person attending the appeal, and was present when the order was made. There were four or five of the magistrates at the adjournment who were at the original sessions. A witness proved that he served each defendant with a paper, which he told them was a true copy of the order, as in fact it was, and at the time of service read to each the contents of a parchment writing, which was also a true copy of the order, and was produced on the trial. It was objected, first, that as notice to produce the copies served had not been given, evidence could not be given that the copy served was a true copy; but it was held that a notice to produce the paper served would have been notice to produce a notice, which is never required; secondly, that an order to pay 'upon service of the said order, or a true copy thereof,' was bad on the face of it; but it was held to be perfectly sufficient,—that an order of sessions in that form was good. And the service was also good, whether the book of the sessions or the parchment was the order; for if the book was the original, it could not be shewn at the time of the service, and if the parchment was the original, its contents were read over (v). And, lastly, that the adjourned sessions had no jurisdiction to fix the amount of costs (w). The Court held that the justices must be taken to have ordered in the first instance, in the presence of all the parties, that the defendants should pay such costs as the officer might find to be due; and the result of the evidence being that both parties had an opportunity of attending the taxation, and no objection being made when the amount was stated in Court, a state of things took place which amounted to a consent, and therefore the order was valid (x).

The Distress for Rent Act, 1737 (11 Geo. II. c. 19), s. 16 (y), enables two justices to put a landlord in possession of premises in any case where one half-year's (z) rent is in arrear, and the tenant deserts the premises and

(v) Coleridge, J., said: 'An order of the quarter sessions is not like an order of justices out of sessions. It is the judgment of the Court, and that cannot be carried about: it is sufficient if a copy be shewn.'

(w) This point was not then decided; but it is now settled that costs must be

leaves them uncultivated or unoccupied so as no sufficient distress can be had ; and sect. 17 empowers the next justice or justices of assize, on the appeal of the tenant, to award restitution to the tenant. Upon an indictment for disobeying the order of the justices of assize to restore possession to the tenant, it is not necessary to prove the proceedings before the magistrates preliminary to the restitution ; and that it is sufficient to put in the record made up by the justices of the peace, in which, after reciting the complaint and other proceedings, they declare that they put the landlord into possession ; and it is unnecessary to prove the complaint of the landlord (a).

Upon the trial of an indictment for not paying a sum of money pursuant to an order of sessions made on an appeal by the defendant against a certificate of two justices, for stopping up, diverting, and turning a part of a public footway, the record of the order of sessions, together with proof of the service of a copy of the order upon the defendant, and a demand of the sum ordered thereby to be paid, to which the defendant only answered that he did not owe anything, is sufficient evidence to go to the jury, and it is not necessary to prove abunde the existence of the certificate or the fact of the appeal. An order of sessions made upon such an appeal need not show the time at which the certificate of the justices was lodged with the clerk of the peace ; for the sessions have no duty to inquire into that fact, unless the objection is raised before them (b).

On the trial of an indictment against the stewards of a friendly society for disobeying an order of justices, which recited that the rules of such society had been enrolled ; it was held that the recital was not evidence of that fact, which must be proved by other means, in order to shew that the justices had jurisdiction to make the order under 33 Geo. III. c. 54, s. 2 (c). Upon the trial of such an indictment, the Court refused to enter into the merits of the original case, and to hear objections to the order which did not appear upon the face of it (d). But if it appears on the face of the order that the justices had no jurisdiction to make it, the defendant is entitled to acquittal (e).

three-quarters of the value of the demised premises (57 Geo. III. c. 52, s. 1).

(a) R. v. Sewell, 8 Q.B. 161. The very ground of the appeal might be that the justices of the peace had acted without any complaint, and therefore the proof of the complaint could not be necessary. The Court held in this case that the order of the justices of assize must be made by them as individual justices, and not as a Court, and therefore a certificate of such an order, signed by the deputy clerk of assize in the same way as an order of the Court, is not sufficient. It seems also that the order should be signed by the justices of assize, and that they alone, and none of the other commissioners, have jurisdiction to make such an order. As to form of order, see R. v. Traill, 12 A. & E. 761.

ment for embezzlement by the secretary of a friendly society was dismissed for want of proof of the registration of the society. The Act of 1793 was repealed in 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63). Friendly societies are now governed by two Acts of 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. cc. 25, 26), and certain subsequent statutes making minor amendments. Under modern legislation the rules are submitted with an application to register the society, made to the registrar of friendly societies ; and an acknowledgment of registration is conclusive of due registration of the society unless it is proved that the registry has been suspended or cancelled (1896, c. 25, s. 11). *Oakes v. CANADIAN NOTES.

Sec. 1.—Of Contempt of Court and Attacks on the Actions of Judges and Juries.

Contempt of Court is a criminal proceeding. Ellis v. The Queen, 22 Can. S.C.R. 7; Re Scaife, 5 B.C.R. 153. It is therefore necessary that the charge should be proved with particularity. Re Scaife, 5 B.C.R. 153.

While a criminal information for libel was pending against one W., H. wrote a letter to a newspaper reflecting upon one of the Judges who delivered judgment on the application for the information, and stating that W. was "as certain to be convicted as a libeller ever was before his trial." It was held that such letter was clearly contempt of Court. R. v. Wilkinson, Re Houston (1877), 41 U.C.Q.B. 42.

In New Brunswick the practice has been to issue an attachment against the person publishing the newspaper comment complained of, the award of the attachment not being a final judgment but a method of bringing the party into Court where he may be ordered to answer interrogations, and by his answers purge his contempt if he can. If he were unable to then purge his contempt the Court would then pronounce sentence. Ellis v. Baird, 16 Can. S.C.R. 147.

An appeal does not lie to the Supreme Court of Canada from a judgment in proceedings for contempt of Court unless it comes within the provisions of the Supreme Court Act as to appeals in criminal cases. Ellis v. The Queen, 22 Can. S.C.R. 7; O'Shea v. O'Shea, L.R. 15 P.D. 59.

Sec. 2.—Of Acts Affecting Fair Trial of Pending Case.

Where the jury disagreed upon the trial of an indictment and a new jury was ordered for another sittings the cause is meanwhile still a pending one and improper and impartial comments thereon published by one of the accused will constitute a contempt of Court by him. The Court imposing sentence upon a newspaper proprietor for a contempt of Court contained in newspaper comment may, in addition to the infliction of a fine and imprisonment, require the accused to find securities to keep the peace and to refrain from publishing further articles reflecting on the pending cause, and may order imprisonment for six months, or until security is sooner given, or until the pending cause is sooner ended. The King v. Charlier, 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 486.

Any publication, whether by parties or strangers, which concerns a cause pending in Court, and has a tendency to prejudice the public concerning its merits, and to corrupt the administration of justice, or which reflects on the tribunal or its proceedings, or on the parties, the jury, the witnesses or the counsel may be visited as a contempt. R. v. Wilkinson, Re. Houston (1877), 41 U.C.Q.B. 42, citing Bishop on Criminal Law, 5th ed., vol. 2, sec. 259.

Where the respondent in a controverted election case applied for an order nisi calling on the defendant, his opponent at the election, to shew cause why he should not be committed for contempt of Court for publishing articles in his newspaper reflecting on and pre-judging the conduct of the respondent and of the returning officer during the currency of the proceedings on the election petition, it was held, although a prima facie case of contempt had been made out, that as it appears on the same material that the respondent had attended and spoken at a meeting held for the purpose of approving of the conduct of the returning officer and presenting him with a gold watch as a mark of such public approval, the applicant was also in fault, and his application was therefore refused. Re Bothwell Election Case, 4 Ont. R. 224.

Where the alleged contempt consisted in the publishing, in a newspaper, comments on a judgment rendered by a Master in Chambers in a cause in which the writer was solicitor for the defendant, but after the proceedings in the cause before the Master were ended, it was held by the Supreme Court of Canada that the relator in the cause could not be prejudiced as a suitor by the publication complained of, and as such prejudice was the only ground on which he could institute proceedings for contempt he had no locus standi, and his application should not have been entertained. Re O'Brien, Regina ex rel. Felitz v. Howland, 16 Can. S.C.R. 197, reversing 11 Ont. R. 633, and 14 Ont. App. 184.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

OF OBSTRUCTING OR RESISTING THE EXECUTION OF LEGAL PROCESS.

SECT. I.—OF OBSTRUCTING PROCESS.

OBSTRUCTING the execution of lawful process, whether civil or criminal, is an offence against public justice ; and it has even been held that the party opposing an arrest upon criminal process becomes thereby particeps criminis : that is, an accessory after the fact in felony, and a principal in high treason (a). Where the process, whether civil or criminal, is that of a superior Court of record, the obstruction may be dealt with summarily as contempt of Court (b).

Giving assistance to a felon pursued by officers of justice, in order to enable him to avoid arrest, is a misdemeanor, as being an obstruction to the course of public justice (c). An indictment was preferred against the defendant for rendering assistance to O. (who had committed forgery and was being pursued by officers of justice), in order to enable O. to avoid arrest. It appeared in evidence that O. had committed a forgery, as stated in the indictment ; and had afterwards thrown himself from the top of a house, by which he was greatly hurt ; and that the defendant, who was a relation and commiserated his wretched condition, conveyed him secretly on board a barge to Bristol, and was actively employed there in endeavouring to enable him to escape from the country. Advertisements had been printed and circulated, stating the charge against O., and offering a large reward for his apprehension ; but it was not proved that any one of these advertisements had come to the knowledge of the defendant or that the defendant was acquainted with the particular charge against O., or knew that he had been guilty of forgery, as alleged in the indictment. Upon this ground the defendant was acquitted : but no other objection was taken to the indictment.

Privilege.—There is not now any privilege in respect of place (d) or person against arrest on criminal process (e).

(a) 2 Hawk. c. 17, s. 1, where Hawkins submits that it is reasonable to understand the books which seem to contradict this opinion to intend no more than that it is not felony in the party himself, who is attacked in order to be arrested, to save himself from the arrest by such resistance : and see 4 Bl. Com. 128.

(b) Vide ante, p. 542.

(c) R. v. Buckle [1821], Gloucester Spring Assizes, Garrow, B. The case states that 'Olive had committed forgery,' not that he was 'suspected of felony,' as stated in former editions of this work. C. S. G.

(d) At one time there were many pretended privileged places in London and Southwark, in which fugitives from civil and criminal justice claimed freedom from arrest, on pretence that they had been anciently royal palaces. Such were the White Friars and its environs, the Savoy, and the Mint in Southwark. The supposed privilege of such places has been taken away by legislation. See 8 & 9 Will. III. c. 27 ; 9 Geo. I. c. 28 ; 11 Geo. I. c. 22. A similar abuse created by the recognition of sanctuary was finally suppressed in 1623, by 21 Jac. I. c. 28.

(e) Re Freston, 11 Q.B.D. 545. As to arrest of witnesses, vide post, Bk. xiii. c. v.

Privilege from arrest on civil process continues in favour of members of either House of Parliament while Parliament is sitting, and in favour of barristers, solicitors, police and witnesses eundo, morando et redeundo from a case in which they are concerned (f), and of ministers of religion, while officiating in a place of worship or in the burial of the dead, or going to or from such service (g).

In some proceedings, particularly in those relating to the execution of the revenue laws (h), the Legislature has made special provision for the punishment of those who obstruct officers and persons acting under proper authority. But in ordinary cases, where the offence committed is less than felony, the obstruction of officers in the apprehension of the party is only a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and (or) imprisonment (i).

An indictment for obstructing the execution of process must state that the arrest was lawful, i.e., made by proper authority (j).

But where the process is regular, and is executed by the proper officer, it is not lawful even for a peace officer to obstruct such officer, on the ground that the execution of it is attended with an affray and disturbance of the peace; for if one, having sufficient authority, issues a lawful command, it is not in the power of any other, having an equal authority in the same respect, to issue a contrary command; as that would be to legalise confusion and disorder (k). Some sheriff's officers having apprehended a man by virtue of a writ against him, a mob collected, and endeavoured by violence to rescue the prisoner. In the course of the scuffle, which was at ten o'clock at night, one of the bailiffs, having been violently assaulted, struck one of the assailants, a woman, and it was thought for some time that he had killed her; whereupon, and before her recovery was ascertained, the constable was sent for, and invited to arrest the bailiff who had struck the woman. The bailiffs, on the other hand, gave the constable notice of their authority, and represented the violence which had been previously offered to them; notwithstanding which the constable proceeded to take them into custody upon a charge of murder, and at first offered to take care also of their prisoner; but their prisoner was soon rescued from them by the surrounding mob. The next morning, the woman having recovered, the bailiffs were released by the constable. Upon these facts, Heath, J., was of opinion that the constable and his assistants were guilty of assault and rescue (l).

By the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (m), 'if a sheriff finds any resistance on the execution of a writ' (including any legal process, s. 38), 'he shall take with him the power of the county (n), and shall go in proper person to do execution, and may arrest the resisters and commit them to prison, and every such resister shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

Where the obstruction of process by the rescue of a party arrested is accompanied by violence and assault upon the officer, the offence is indictable; and rescuing, or attempting to rescue a party arrested on a criminal charge is usually punished upon indictment (o). The offence of rescuing a person arrested on mesne process, or in execution after judgment, subjects the offender to an action in which damages are recoverable (p). And the Courts have often granted an attachment against such wrongdoers, it being the highest violence and contempt that can be offered to the process of the Court (q).

SECT. II.—RESCUE OF PROPERTY LAWFULLY SEIZED.

A. Property Distrained.

Distress for Rent.—Rescue of a distress for rent consists in retaking from the distrainer goods legally (r) distrained and in the possession of the distrainer by her bailiffs before they have been placed in the custody of the law by being lawfully impounded (s). It is a misdemeanor at common law (s), if the retaking is forcible and amounts to a breach of the public peace (t); but a mere trespass without circumstances of violence is not indictable (u).

A lessee who resists with force a distress for rent or forestalls or rescues the distress is guilty of forcible detainer (v).

Distress of Animals damage feasant.—Where a hayward had distrained a horse damage feasant on a private enclosed piece of pasture, and it was rescued from him on the way to the pound, and before it was impounded; it was held that this was not indictable, for till the horse got to the pound the hayward was merely acting as the servant of the owner of the land (w). If the hayward (who was a manorial officer) had distrained the animal while straying on a common or in a lane, the animal would have been in the custody of the law from the moment of seizure and the rescue indictable (x).

B. Property Impounded.

Pound-breach consists in the wrongful removal, whether with or without force, of cattle or other personal property from a place in which they have been lawfully 'impounded,' and thereby placed in the custody of the law (y), e.g., by placing cattle seized under a distress for rent in an enclosed field (z).

It has been doubted whether a pound-breach (a) is an indictable offence, if unaccompanied by a breach of the peace (b). But, on the other hand, it had been submitted that, as pound-breach is an injury and insult to public justice, it is indictable as such at common law (c), and the latter view has been accepted in two recent cases at Quarter Sessions (d).

The Pound-breach Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 30), provides for the summary conviction of any person who releases cattle distrained on enclosed land (e).

The civil remedy, however, given by 2 Will. & M. c. 5, s. 4, in most cases of pound-breach, or rescue of goods distrained for rent, is the best remedy where the offenders are responsible persons (f). That statute enacts that, upon pound-breach, or rescous of goods distrained for rent, the person grieved shall, in a special action on the case, recover treble damages and costs against the offenders, or against the owner of the goods, if they come to his use (g).

C. Goods Seized under Legal Process.

It is laid down in the books (h) that if rescues are made upon a distress, &c., for the King, an indictment lies against the rescuer (h). This rule appears to be applicable to distress levied under the warrant of justices of the peace. Such goods on lawful seizure are at once in custodia legis (i). Thus, where a defendant was indicted for rescuing goods distrained for a church-rate it seems not to have been doubted that such a rescue was indictable (j).

On an indictment in Ireland for rescuing property distrained for poor-rate, it was held unnecessary to prove the making of the rate, or that there was any sum due at the time of making the distress; and that the warrant to collect, if in the form and with the requisites required by the Poor Law Act, was sufficient prima facie evidence of the authority of the collector; and that the section which required the sum to be collected to be specified in the warrant was satisfied by a reference in the warrant to the collector's book delivered at the time to the collector, and by such reference the book became incorporated with the warrant (k). But where on a similar indictment the warrant was in the same form as in the preceding case, but the occupiers were described in the collector's book as 'tenants of commons,' it was held that the collector had no authority to distrain on the actual occupier, as the description in the book was insufficient (l).

On a similar indictment it appeared that in the rate-book and distress warrant the occupier was described as J. W. Evidence was given that J. W. was the occupier when the rate was struck, but had died before issue of the warrant. It was held that the distress was lawful as the collector, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 92, s. 6, was entitled to distrain all goods and chattels, to whomsoever they might belong, found on premises in respect of which any person was rated as occupier (m).

In Ireland rescue without actual force from a special bailiff of a cow taken by him under a civil bill decree was held not to be indictable at common law (n). In another case a bailiff under a sheriff's warrant addressed to him alone, and not to him and his assistants, seized goods in execution, and left them in charge of keepers and went away. During his absence the goods were rescued by the defendant from the keepers. It was held that on these facts the defendant could not lawfully be convicted of having by threats and violence compelled the bailiff to abandon the seizure (o).

For a man to retake from a sheriff's officer his own goods seized under a writ of execution against the goods of another though apparently not larceny (p) might perhaps involve the offence of rescue (q).

Summary Trial of Offence.—Code sec. 773.

Where a bystander states to other bystanders in the hearing of a police officer making an arrest for drunkenness, that the person being arrested is not drunk, such does not constitute the offence of obstructing a peace officer, if the statement is made bonâ fide, and in the belief of its truth. If, in an unwarranted attempt of the police to arrest the bystander, the latter strikes a policeman, he is not guilty of an assault upon the peace officer in the execution of his duty, for the policeman had no duty to arrest him. The King v. Cook, 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 32.

Where the process of an inferior Court is void by reason of its containing a direction to a peace officer to seize certain goods at a place outside of the territorial jurisdiction of the Court, such process is insufficient upon which to base a conviction for resisting the officer in its execution. R. v. Finlay (1901), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 539 (Man.).

Where a bailiff obtained possession of goods under a writ of replevin, but at the request of the party in whose possession they were seized they were given by the bailiff into the possession of a third party, the latter giving the bailiff an undertaking or agreement to deliver him the goods on demand, it was held that in attempting to retake the goods in the possession of the third party the bailiff was not acting in the execution of any "process," but merely upon the undertaking. R. v. Carley, 18 C.L.T. 26.

The re-taking of possession by the vendor under a contract for the conditional sale of chattels is not within the term "lawful distress or seizure" as here used, and an obstruction of the vendor's bailiff in regaining possession is not an offence under this section. R. v. Shand (1904), 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 45, 7 O.L.R. 190.

Punishment on Summary Conviction.—Code sec. 781.

As the penalty under Code sec. 169 is imprisonment or fine, and under Code sec. 781 may be both imprisonment and fine, the question has arisen whether a magistrate with power to do alone such acts as are usually required to be done by two or more justices must not be governed by the provisions of Part XVI, to the exclusion of power to act under Code sec. 169.

In R. v. Crossen (1899), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 153 (Man.), it was held that the parties accused of resisting a peace officer in the execution of his duty could not be tried summarily by two justices except after compliance with Code sec. 778, notwithstanding Code sec. 169, and this ruling was followed in R. v. Carmichael (1902), 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 167 (N.S.).

In R. v. Nelson (1901), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 461 (B.C.), it was held by Mr. Justice Drake that the accused can be tried summarily by the magistrate under the summary convictions clauses of the Code, or he can be tried before a magistrate as for an indictable offence.

In R. v. Jack (No. 2) (1902), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 304, Mr. Justice Walkem, of the Supreme Court of British Columbia held that the offence of obstructing a peace officer in the performance of his duty, where an assault upon the officer is not also charged, may be summarily tried either by two justices of the peace, or a police magistrate under the summary convictions part of the Code by virtue of sec. 169; and that the latter section is not controlled by the provisions of secs. 773 and 781 as to the summary trial of the like offence before a magistrate with the consent of the accused.

In the opinion of Walkem, J., the punishment on summary conviction is limited to that specified in sec. 169. Sec. 781 providing a different punishment on a trial before a magistrate with the consent of the accused would have no application where the procedure under the summary convictions clauses was followed.

Semble, if the charge were for an assault on the officer in the performance of his duty, secs. 773 and 781 would then apply and not sec. 169.

In the Province of British Columbia the magistrate has absolute jurisdiction to proceed under the summary trials' part (XV.) by sec. 784(3) without the consent of the accused, and to award both fine and imprisonment under sec. 776.

It is necessary for the prosecution to prove that rent was due and in arrear before a conviction can be made under this section for the offence of wilfully obstructing a lawful distress. On such a charge evidence is admissible for the defence in proof that no rent was due. R. v. Harron (1903), 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 543, 6 O.L.R. 668.

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

OF ESCAPES.

A. General Rule.

AN escape is where one who is arrested gains his liberty before he is delivered by due course of law (a). It is distinct from flight from justice before arrest (b).

The term 'escape' is usually applied where the liberation of the prisoner is effected either by himself or others, without force. Where it is effected by the prisoner himself with force, it is called prison-breaking; and where it is effected by others, with force, it is commonly called a rescue (c).

Escapes fall into three classes—escape by the prisoner, escape suffered by an officer of the law, and escape suffered by a private person who has the prisoner in custody. But these distinctions, while recognised as to common law offences, cannot be applied with exactness to the statutes regulating offences of these classes.

B. Escapes by the Party.

As all persons are bound to submit themselves to the judgment of the law, those who, when lawfully arrested on criminal process, free themselves from custody before they are put in a prison or other legal place of detention, are guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment (d). It is also criminal in a prisoner to escape from lawful confinement on a criminal charge though no force or artifice be used on his part to effect such purpose. Thus, a prisoner is guilty of a misdemeanor if he goes out of his prison by licence of the keeper (e), without any obstruction, the doors being open by the consent or negligence of the gaoler, or if he escapes in any other manner, without using any kind of force or violence, or if after his prison has been broken by others, without his procurement or consent, he escapes through the breach so made (f).

The punishment for escape by the party is fine and (or) imprisonment (g). The common law as to escape has been usually regarded as (a) Termes de la Ley.

(b) Provision is made for the arrest of persons charged with indictable offences, who fly from justice out of the country in which the offence was committed. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, ss. 12, 13, 14, 16; Extradition Acts, 1870-1906; and Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881.

(g) 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29, authorises the imposition of hard labour for 'escape,' not saying whether escape by the party is meant, or escape suffered by custodians.

applying only to persons in custody on a criminal charge, but in one case it has been held as misdemeanor at common law for a prisoner to escape who was in gaol under the order of a bankruptcy court (h).

C. Escapes suffered by Officers of the Law.

An escape of this kind must be from lawful custody.

There must have been an actual arrest; and if an officer, having a warrant to arrest a man, sees him shut up in a house and challenges him as his prisoner, but never actually has him in custody, and the party gets away from the house, the officer cannot be charged with an escape (i).

The custody must be lawful; for, if a man is arrested for a supposed crime, when no such crime was committed, and the party is neither indicted nor charged, or for such a slight suspicion of an actual crime and by such an irregular process as will not justify arrest or detention, the officer is not guilty of an escape by suffering the prisoner to go at large (j). But if a warrant of commitment plainly and expressly charges a man with treason or felony, though it be not strictly formal, the custodian suffering an escape is punishable; and where commitments are good in substance, the custodian is as much bound to observe them as if they were made ever so exactly (k). Whenever an imprisonment is so far irregular that it will be no offence in the prisoner to break from it by force, it can be no offence in the officer to suffer him to escape (l).

It is generally considered that the imprisonment must be for some criminal matter. The escape of one committed for petty larceny (m) was criminal; and on general principles of law to suffer the escape of a person committed for any other crime whatsoever would also be criminal (n). It has been held criminal to assist the escape of a man arrested under order of a bankruptcy court; and this decision would seem to depend for its justification on the conception that escape from lawful custody in a civil matter is a criminal offence (o).

A sheriff who allows a prisoner on civil process to escape is liable to attachment or to summary punishment under the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (p). The imprisonment must also be continuing at the time of the escape; and its continuance must be grounded on that satisfaction which public justice demands for the crime committed.

Voluntary Escape.—According to the older authorities whenever

It is said not to have been criminal to let a prisoner go who had been acquitted and detained until he paid his fees. 2 Hawk. c. 19, s. 4. This matter, discussed in the last edition (vol. 1, p. 891, and note), is no longer material, as no fees are now payable by prisoners to gaolers or officers of the Court: and penalties are imposed for exacting them or detaining prisoners for non-payment. 55 Geo. III. c. 50, ss. 4, 5, 9, 13; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 114. And see Mee v. Cruikshank, 20 Cox, 210.

an officer, having the custody of a prisoner charged with, and guilty of, a capital offence, knowingly gives him his liberty with an intent to save him either from trial or execution, such officer is guilty of a voluntary escape, and liable to the same punishment as the prisoner whom he has allowed to escape (q). Hawkins says that Hale was of opinion (r) that in some cases an officer might be guilty of a voluntary escape who had no intention to save the prisoner, but meant only to give him a liberty which, by law, he had no colour or right to give (s); but dissents from Hale's opinion, on the ground that it is not sufficiently supported by authorities, and does not seem to accord with the purview of 5 Edw. III. c. 8 (t). He considers that a person who has power to bail is guilty only of negligent escape, by bailing one who is not bailable; and that in some cases an officer found to have knowingly given his prisoner more liberty than he ought to have had (as by allowing him to go out of prison on a promise to return; or to go amongst his friends, to find some who would warrant goods to be his own which he is suspected to have stolen), seems to have been only adjudged guilty of a negligent escape (u). And suggests that if, in these cases, the officer were only guilty of a negligent escape, in suffering the prisoner to go out of the limits of the prison, without security for his return, he could not have been guilty in a higher degree if he had taken bail for his return; and that it is therefore reasonable to infer that it cannot be a general rule that an officer is guilty of a voluntary escape by bailing his prisoner, whom he has no power to bail, but that the judgment of all offences of this kind must depend upon the circumstances of the case; such as the heinousness of the crime with which the prisoner is charged, the notoriety of his guilt, the improbability of his returning to render himself to justice, the intention of the officer, and the motives on which he acted (v).

Under the present law the question of granting bail is for the High Court or for justices of the peace and not for governors of prisons, and all felonies and misdemeanors are bailable. The police have certain powers of releasing on bail, but not in the case of indictable offences. So that the opinions of Hale and Hawkins are now only of abstract interest.

At common law a gaoler was bound to keep persons entrusted to him until delivered under order of a Court or otherwise in due course of law, and could not transfer them to another gaol without judicial directions.

By the Prison Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. 126), ss. 63, 64, and 65, prisoners may under certain circumstances be removed from one prison to another and into different jurisdictions, without the gaoler incurring any liability for escape (w).

Negligent Escape.—A negligent escape is where the party arrested

(u) See Att.-Gen. v. Hobert, Cro. Car. 210; 79 E. R. 784. The prisoner was in the Gatehouse Prison for misdemeanor, and was allowed out by licence of the gaoler, on the ground of sickness in the prison. Hawkins says that, generally, the old cases on this subject are so very briefly reported that it is very difficult to make an exact state of the matter from them.

(v) 2 Hawk. c. 19, s. 10.

or imprisoned escapes against the will of him that arrests or imprisons him, and is not freshly pursued and taken again before he has been lost sight of (x). Where a party so escapes the law will presume negligence in the officer. Thus, if a person in custody on a charge of larceny, suddenly, and without the assent of the constable, kills, hangs, or drowns himself, this is considered as a negligent escape in the constable (y). Hale says that if a prisoner charged with felony breaks a gaol, this seems to be a negligent escape, on the ground that the gaol should have been more secure or the officers more vigilant (z).

Undoubtedly an escape happening from defects in these particulars would come within the principle of guilty negligence in those responsible in the proper custody of the criminal; but it is submitted that a person charged with a negligent escape under such circumstances would be entitled to shew in his defence that all due vigilance was used, and that the gaol was so constructed as to have been considered by persons of competent judgment a place of perfect security (a).

If a justice of peace bails a person not bailable by law, it excuses the gaoler, and is not felony in the justice, but is said to render him liable to fine as for a negligent escape (b). Whoever de facto occupies the office of custodian of a prisoner is liable to answer for a negligent escape (c). But it seems that an indictment for a negligent escape will only lie against those officers upon whom the law casts the obligation of safe custody. Thus, on an indictment against one of the yeoman warders of the Tower and the gentleman gaoler, for permitting the escape of P. who had been committed for high treason, it appeared that the constable of the Tower had committed P. to the special care of the yeoman warder; but the Court held that the defendants were not such officers as the law took notice of, and therefore could not be guilty of a negligent escape (d). But a sheriff is as much liable to answer for an escape suffered by his bailiff as if he had actually suffered it himself; and the Court may charge either sheriff or bailiff for such an escape (e).

(e) 2 Hawk. c. 19, s. 29, and R. v. Fell,

The difference between voluntary and negligent escape is important in considering the effect of the retaking of a prisoner after he had been suffered to escape.

When an officer has voluntarily suffered a prisoner to escape, it is said that he can no more justify retaking him than if he had never had him in custody ; because, by his own free consent, he has admitted that he has nothing to do with him ; but if the prisoner returns and puts himself again under the custody of the officer, it seems that the officer may lawfully detain him, and take him before a justice to be dealt with according to law (f).

An officer who makes fresh pursuit after a prisoner, who has escaped through his negligence, may retake him at any time afterwards, whether he finds him in the same or a different county : and it would seem that an officer who has negligently suffered a prisoner to escape, may retake him, wherever he finds him, even without fresh pursuit. For since the liberty gained by the prisoner is wholly owing to his own wrongful act, there seems no reason why he should have any manner of advantage from it (g). If the officer pursues a prisoner, who flies from him, so closely as to retake him without losing sight of him, this is not in law an escape ; but if the officer once loses sight of the prisoner, it seems that he will be guilty of a negligent escape, even though he retakes him immediately afterwards (h). And where he has been fined for the escape he does not purge the offence or avoid the fine by retaking the prisoner (i). Nor can he excuse himself by killing a prisoner in the pursuit (j), though he could not possibly retake him (k).

The offence of suffering an escape is an indictable misdemeanor, but may be proceeded against by attachment of criminal information (l).

Where persons present in a Court of record are committed to prison by such Court, the keeper of the prison of the Court is bound to have them already to produce when called for, and if he fails to produce them, may be adjudged guilty of an escape, without further inquiry ; unless he has some reasonable excuse ; as that the prison was set on fire, or broken open by enemies, &c., for he is precluded by the record of the commitment from denying that the prisoners were in his custody (m). It has been said (n), that if a gaoler says nothing in excuse of such an escape, it shall be adjudged voluntary : but it seems difficult to maintain that where it is not certain, whether an escape is negligent or voluntary, it ought to be adjudged a crime of so high a nature, without a previous trial (o). With respect to prisoners not committed by a Court of record, but in the lawful custody of any person, by any other means whatsoever, it seems to be agreed that the custodian is not punishable for an escape, except on indictment (p).

According to the older authorities a person who had suffered another to escape could not be arraigned for such escape as for felony, until the principal had been attainted; on the ground that he was only punishable as an accessory to the felony, and that the general rule was, that no accessory ought to be tried until the principal had been attainted (q); but that he might be indicted and tried for a misprision before any attainder of the principal offender; for, whether such offender were guilty or innocent, it was a high contempt to suffer him to escape. If, however, the commitment were for high treason, and the person committed actually guilty of it, it was said that the escape was immediately punishable as high treason also, whether the party escaping were ever convicted of such crime or not; and the reason given was, that there are no accessories in high treason (r). Under the present law the rules as to the trial of accessories are different (s). But the effect of the change on the offence of voluntary escape has not been judicially determined.

Every indictment for negligent or voluntary escape should expressly shew that the party was actually in the defendant's custody for some crime, or upon some commitment upon suspicion of crime (t). Judgment was arrested upon an indictment which stated that the prisoner was in the defendant's custody, and charged with a certain crime, but did not state that he was committed for that crime; for a person in custody may be charged with a crime, and yet not be in custody by reason of such charge (u). But where a person was committed to the custody of a constable by a watchman, as a loose and disorderly woman and a street-walker, it was held, upon an indictment against the constable for discharging her, that by an allegation of his being charged with her, 'so being such loose,' &c., it was sufficiently averred that he was charged with her 'as such loose,' &c.; and it was also held unnecessary to aver that the constable knew the woman to be a street-walker (v). And every indictment should also shew that the prisoner went at large (w); and also the time when the offence was committed for which the party was (p) 2 Hawk. c. 19, s. 16. It is laid down as a rule, that though where an escape is finable, the presentment of it is traversable; yet that where the offence is amerciable only, there the presentment is of itself conclusive; such amerciaments being reckoned amongst those minima de quibus non curat lex (Staundf. c. 32, p. 36); and this distinction is said to be well warranted by the old books (2 Hawk. c. 19, s. 21): and see post, p. 561.

(q) As to present rule, vide ante, p. 130. A person who has suffered a convicted felon to escape is an accessory after the fact, R. v. Burrigge, 3 P. Wms. 439; 24 E. in custody ; that it may appear that it was prior to the escape (x). An indictment for a voluntary escape should allege that the defendant ' feloniously and voluntarily permitted the prisoner to go at large ' (y) ; and should state the particular crime for which the party was imprisoned ; for it will not be sufficient to say, in general, that he was in custody for felony, &c. (z). But it is questionable whether such certainty, as to the nature of the crime, is necessary in an indictment for a negligent escape ; as it is not in such case material whether the person who escaped were guilty or not (a).

Jurisdiction.—By 3 Edw. I. (Stat. West. prim.), c. 3 (b), the proceedings and trial for the offence of an escape were to be had before the justices in eyre of assize ; but the statute did not affect the jurisdiction of the Court of King's Bench (c). 31 Edw. III. stat. 1, c. 14, enacts, that ' the escape of thieves and felons, and the chattels of felons, and of fugitives, and also escapes of clerks convict out of their ordinaries' prison, from thenceforth to be judged before any of the King's justices, shall be levied from time to time, as they shall fall as well of the time past as of the time to come ' (d). The Act seems not to be limited to justices ' in eyre,' and justices of gaol delivery may punish justices of peace for a negligent escape, in admitting persons to bail who are not bailable (e).

Punishment.—It is considered that voluntary escape amounts to the same kind of crime as the offence of which the party was guilty, and for which he was in custody ; whether the person escaping were actually committed to gaol, or under arrest only, and not committed ; and whether he were ' attainted,' or only accused but not indicted, of such crime (f). No one is liable to the higher degree of punishment for a voluntary escape but the person actually permitting of it ; therefore, a principal gaoler was held to be only finable for a voluntary escape suffered by his deputy (g).

B. Negligent Escape.—Whenever a person is found guilty upon indictment of a negligent escape of a criminal actually in his custody, he is liable to a fine (h). It is said that, by the common law, the penalty

But this does not clearly appear from the old books ; for in some of them it seems to be taken as a fine, in others as an amercement ; and in others it is spoken of generally as the imposition of a certain sum, and without any mention of either fine or amercement.' There is probably a misconception as to the nature of a fine in mediæval times. See 2 Pollock & Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law, 512.

for suffering the negligent escape of a person 'attainted' was of course a hundred pounds, and for suffering such escape of a person indicted, and not attainted, five pounds, and that if the person escaping were neither attainted nor indicted, it was left to the discretion of the Court to assess such a reasonable forfeiture as should seem proper. And it seems also, that if the party had escaped twice, these penalties were, as of course, to be doubled; but that the forfeiture was no greater for suffering a prisoner to escape who had been committed on two several accusations, than if he had been committed but on one (i).

In 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29 (j), which allows a sentence of imprisonment with hard labour for escape, it is not stated whether it is meant to apply to escape permitted by the gaoler or escape by the party.

The law with respect to escapes suffered by private persons is in general the same as in relation to those suffered by officers. Wherever any person has another lawfully in his custody, whether upon an arrest made by himself or another, he is guilty of an escape if he suffers him to go at large before he has delivered him over to some other who by law ought to have the custody of him. If a private person arrests another on suspicion of felony, and delivers him into the custody of another private person, who receives him and suffers him to go at large, it is said that both of them are guilty of an escape; the first, because he should not have parted with him till he had delivered him into the hands of a public officer; the latter, because, having charged himself with the custody of a prisoner, he ought, at his peril, to have taken care of him (k).

But where a private person, having made an arrest on suspicion of felony, delivers over his prisoner to the proper officer, as the sheriff or his bailiff, or a constable, from whose custody the prisoner escapes, the private person will not be chargeable (l).

A private person who voluntarily allows his lawful prisoner to escape is punishable as an officer would be for the same offence (m); and for an escape due to his negligence, he is punishable by fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the Court (n).

Hawkins states (Bk. ii. c. 19, s. 32, and more fully c. 37, s. 28) that a negligent escape may be pardoned before it happens; but a voluntary one cannot be so pardoned; such pardon would be by way of indemnity. The defendant having been afterwards imprisoned under a warrant issued two months after the date of sentence, held that the term of imprisonment is to be counted from the day of passing sentence and that the defendant was not liable as upon an escape to make up the period for which he was so at liberty, as there was no mens rea and the magistrate's action was a "lawful excuse" quoad the defendant. CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

PRISON BREAKING.

Common Law.—Where a person who is lawfully in prison effects his escape by force or against the gaoler's will (a), the offence is usually called prison breaking; and such breach of prison, or even the conspiring to break it, is felony at common law, for whatever cause, criminal or civil, the party was lawfully imprisoned (b); and whether he were actually within the walls of a prison or only in the stocks, or in the custody of any person who had lawfully arrested him (c). At common law the offender was liable to suffer death on conviction, but the severity of the common law is mitigated by a statute of 1295 (23 Edw. I. (d), De frangentibus prisonam), which enacts, 'That none, from henceforth, that breaketh prison, shall have judgment of life or member for breaking of prison only; except the cause for which he was taken and imprisoned did require such judgment, if he had been convict thereupon, according to the law and custom of the realm, albeit in times past it hath been used otherwise.' Thus though to break prison and escape, when lawfully committed for any treason or felony, remains still felony as at common law; to break prison when lawfully confined upon a lesser charge, is punishable only as a misdemeanor, i.e., by fine and imprisonment (e).

Any place whatsoever wherein a person, under a lawful arrest for a supposed crime, is restrained of his liberty, whether in the stocks, or the street, or in the common gaol, or the police cells, or the house of a constable or private person, is a prison at common law (f) and within the meaning of the above statute; for 'imprisonment' means restraint of liberty (g). The statute extends as well to a prison in law as to a prison in deed (h).

A person taken upon a capias, awarded on an indictment against him for a supposed treason or felony, is within the statute if he breaks prison, whether such crime were or were not committed by him or by any other person; for there is an accusation against him on record, which makes his commitment lawful, though he may be innocent and the prosecution groundless. And if an innocent person be lawfully committed to prison on such a suspicion of felony (actually done by some other) as will justify his imprisonment, though he be not indicted, he is within the statute if he break the prison; for he was legally in custody, and ought to have submitted to it until he had been discharged by due course of law (i).

But if no felony at all was committed, and the party had not been indicted, no warrant or committal for such supposed crime would make him guilty within the statute, by breaking the prison; his imprisonment being unjustifiable. And though a felony were committed, yet if there were no just cause of suspicion either to arrest or commit the party, his breaking the prison will not be felony if the warrant or order of committal is not in such form as the law requires; because the lawfulness of his imprisonment in such case depends wholly on the warrant, &c.; but if the party were taken up for such strong causes of suspicion as would justify his arrest and commitment, it seems that it will be felony in him to break the prison, though he happens to have been committed by an informal warrant (j).

The crime for which the party must be imprisoned, in order to make his breaking the prison felony within the meaning of the statute, must be capital at the time of his breaking the prison (k). But it is not material whether the offence for which the party was imprisoned were capital at the time of the passing of the statute, or were made so by subsequent statutes; for, since all breaches of prison were felonies by the common law, which is limited by the statute only in respect of imprisonment for offences not capital, when an offence becomes capital, it is as much out of the benefit of the statute as if it had always been so (l).

An offender breaking prison, while it is uncertain whether his offence will become capital, is highly punishable for his contempt, by fine and imprisonment (m).

If the crime for which the party is arrested, and with which he is charged in the commitment is not capital, and the offence is not in fact greater than the commitment states, breaking the prison will not amount to felony within the statute (n). And though the offence as expressed in the commitment is capital, yet if, in the event, it is found not to be capital, it is difficult to maintain that the breaking of the prison on a commitment for it can be felony; as the words of the statute are, 'except the cause for which he was taken and imprisoned require such a judgment' (n). On the other hand, if the offence which was the cause of the commitment is in fact capital but is expressed in the commitment as one less severely punishable, it is suggested that the breaking of the prison by the party is felony within the statute (o). It was not material whether the party who broke prison were under an accusation only, or actually attainted of the crime charged against him; for persons attainted, breaking prison, were as much within the exception of the statute as any others (p).

(o) 2 Hawk. c. 18, s. 15. Hawkins, after giving his reasons for these conclusions, says that no express resolution of the points appearing, and that as the authors who have expounded the statute (see Co. Inst. 590, 591; Sum. 109, 110; 1 Hale, 609) seem rather to incline to a different opinion, he will leave these matters to the judgment of the reader.

(p) Staundf. c. 32. 2 Hawk. c. 18, s. 16.

A person committed for high treason becomes guilty of felony only, and not of high treason, by breaking the prison and escaping singly, without letting out any other prisoner : but if other persons, committed also for high treason, escape together with him, and his intention in breaking the prison is to favour their escape as well as his own, he seems to be guilty of high treason in respect of their escape, because there are no accessories in high treason ; and such assistance given to persons committed for felony will make him who gives it an accessory to the felony, and by the same reasoning a principal in the case of high treason (q).

The breach of the prison within the meaning of the statute must be actual, and not merely a constructive breaking. Therefore, if the party go out of a prison without obstruction, the prison doors being open through the consent or negligence of the gaoler, or if he otherwise escape, without using any kind of force or violence, he seems to be guilty of a misdemeanour only (r). But the breaking need not be intentional. Thus where a prisoner made his escape from a house of correction, by tying two ladders together, and placing them against the wall of the yard, but in getting over threw down some bricks which were placed loose at the top (so as to give way upon being laid hold of), the judges were unanimously of opinion that this was a prison breach (s). The breaking must be either by the prisoner himself, or by others through his procurement, or at least with his privity ; for if the prison is broken by others without his procurement or consent, and he escapes through the breach so made, it seems that he cannot be indicted for the breaking, but only for the escape (t). And the breaking must not be from the necessity of an inevitable accident happening, without the contrivance or fault of the prisoner ; as if the prison should be set on fire by accident, and he should break it open to save his life (u). It seems also that no breach of prison will amount to felony, unless the prisoner actually escapes (v).

The offence of prison breach differs from those of escape or rescue in that a party may be arraigned for prison breaking before he is convicted of the crime for which he was imprisoned, on the ground that it is not material whether he is guilty of such crime or not, and that he is punishable as a principal offender in respect of the breach of prison (w). But if the party has been indicted and acquitted of the felony for which he was committed, he is not to be indicted at common law or under the old statute afterwards for the breach of prison ; for though, while the principal felony was untried, it was immaterial whether he were guilty of it or not, or rather the breach of prison raised a presumption of the guilt of the principal offence, yet, upon its being clear that he was not guilty of the felony, he is in law as a person never committed for felony ; and so his breach of prison is no felony (x).

An indictment for breach of prison, in order to bring the offender within the statute, must specially set forth his case in such manner that it may appear that he was lawfully in prison, and for such a crime as requires judgment of life or member ; and it is not sufficient to say in general 'that he feloniously broke prison' (y) ; as there must be an actual breaking to constitute the offence (z). It is necessary that such breaking be stated in the indictment (a).

The offence of prison breaking and escape, by a party lawfully committed for treason or felony, is a felony (b) ; but was clergyable even when the felony for which the party was committed was not clergyable (c). It is now punishable under 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 8 (d). In this the offence differed from a voluntary escape, which is punishable in the same degree as the offence for which the party suffered to escape was in custody (e). Where the prison breaking is by a party lawfully confined upon charge of misdemeanor, it is punishable as a misdemeanor, by fine and (or) imprisonment (f).

The prisoner was found guilty upon an indictment, which charged that he had been convicted (g) of felony, and sentenced to death ; but had received a pardon on condition (h) of being imprisoned with hard labour in the house of correction for two years : that he was committed to and confined in a house of correction ; and that before the expiration of the two years, he did feloniously break the said house of correction, and make his escape out of it, and go at large. This was held to be punishable as a common-law felony by imprisonment not exceeding a year (i), to begin from the passing of the sentence (j).

As to escapes, &c., from convict prisons, see post, p. 573.

(x) 1 Hale, 612, where it is also said that if the party should be first indicted for the breach of prison, and then be acquitted of the principal felony, he may plead that acquittal of the principal felony, in bar to the indictment for the breach of prison. In R. v. Waters, 12 Cox, 390, W. was given into custody without a warrant on a charge of felony. He was conveyed before a magistrate, who remanded him in custody without any evidence on oath. W. was removed to a lock-up from which he escaped. The charge of felony made against him was dismissed by the magistrates. Martin, B., held that the dismissal by the magistrates was not equivalent to an acquittal by a jury, that the defendant was legally in custody, although no evidence was taken upon oath to justify his remand, and that these facts were no defence to the indictment for breaking prison.

And neither the production of the calendar of the sentences signed by the clerk of assize, and by him delivered to the governor of the prison, nor the evidence of a person who heard sentence passed, was sufficient to prove that a prisoner is in lawful custody under a sentence of imprisonment passed at the assizes ; the record itself had to be produced ; or other proof as provided by statute. R. v. Bourdon, 2 C. & K. 366, Maule, J. It would seem that the conviction can now be proved under 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, s. 18, post, Bk. xiii. tit. 'Evidence.' It is, of course, also necessary to prove that the prisoner was in prison, and that the sentence had not been served or reduced.

Prison Breach.—Code sec. 187.

Attempts to Break Prison.—Code sec. 188.

The expression “prison” includes any penitentiary, common gaol, public or reformatory prison, lock-up, guard room or other place in which persons charged with the commission of offences are usually kept or detained in custody. Sec. 2(30).

CHAPTER THE SIXTH.

RESCUE AND AIDING ESCAPE FROM CUSTODY.

RESCUE, or the offence of forcibly and knowingly freeing another from arrest or imprisonment is, in most instances, of the same nature as prison breaking (a).

Where a prison is such that the party himself would, by the common law, be guilty of felony in breaking from it, a stranger would be guilty of felony in rescuing him from it. But though, upon the principle that wherever the arrest of a felon is lawful rescue of him is a felony, it is not material whether a person arrested for felony, or suspicion of felony, is in the custody of a private person or of an officer; yet if he is in the custody of a private person, it seems that the rescuer should be shewn to have knowledge of the prisoner being under arrest for felony (b). Where the imprisonment is so far groundless or irregular, or for such a cause, or the breaking of it is occasioned by such a necessity, &c., that the party himself breaking the prison is, either by the common law or by 23 Edw. I. De frangentibus prisonam (c), saved from the liability to capital punishment, a stranger who rescues him from such an imprisonment is, in like manner, also excused (d).

A stranger who rescues a person committed for and guilty of high treason, knowing him to be so committed, is guilty of high treason (e), whether he knew that the party rescued were guilty of high treason or not: and he would, in like manner, be guilty of felony by rescuing a felon, though he knew not that the party was imprisoned for felony (f).

As the prisoner himself seems not to be guilty of felony by breaking prison, unless he actually goes out of it (g), the breaking of a prison by a stranger, in order to free the prisoners who are in it, is said not to be felony, unless some prisoner actually by that means gets out of prison (h).

A person cannot be tried for felonious rescue except on indictment. The sheriff's return of rescue is not enough (i).

says that this opinion is not proved by the authority of the case (Y. B. 1 Hen. VI. 5) on which it seems to be grounded. Bensted's case is spoken of in R. v. Burridge, 3 P. Wms. 469, as having been cited and allowed to be law at an assembly of all the then judges of England, except the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, in Limerick's case, Kel. (J.) 77.

(h) 2 Hawk. c. 18, s. 12; c. 21, s. 3.

(i) 1 Hale, 606.

It was considered that he who rescued a person for felony could not be arraigned for such offence as a felony until the principal offender had been attainted (j). But it is said that he might be immediately proceeded against for a misdemeanor (k). If the prisoner were acquitted or convicted of a non-capital offence, the rescuer could not be indicted for felony, but could be convicted of misdemeanor and subjected to fine and imprisonment or either (l).

The indictment for a rescue, like that for an escape (m) or for breaking prison (n), should specially set forth the nature and cause of the imprisonment, and the special circumstances of the fact in question (o). And the word 'rescued' (rescussit), or something equivalent to it, must be used to shew that it was forcible and against the will of the custodian of the prisoner (p).

Punishment.—The rescue of one in custody for felony, or suspicion of felony, is felony (q). At common law the rescue of a person under commitment for burglary (then a transportable offence) was punishable only as a felony within clergy (r). By the Rescue Act, 1821 (1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 88), s. 1, 'if any person shall rescue, or aid and assist in rescuing, from the lawful custody of any constable, officer, head-borough, or other person whomsoever, any person charged with, or suspected of, or committed for any felony, or on suspicion thereof, then if the person or persons so offending shall be convicted of felony, and be entitled to the benefit of clergy, and be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year (s), it shall be lawful for the Court, by or before whom any such person or persons shall be convicted, to order and direct, in case it shall think fit, that such person or persons, instead of being so fined and imprisoned as aforesaid, shall be transported beyond the seas for seven (t) years, or be imprisoned only, or be imprisoned and kept to hard labour in the common gaol, house of correction, or penitentiary house, for any term not less than one and not exceeding three years' (u).

Where the party rescued is in custody for misdemeanor, the rescuer will be punishable as for a misdemeanor; for, as those who break prison are guilty only of misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, in cases wherein they are saved from judgment of death by 23 Edw. I. De frangentibus prisonam, those who rescue such prisoners in the like cases are punishable in the same manner (v). Where a prisoner was indicted for a misdemeanor in aiding and assisting in the rescue of a person, apprehended and in custody under the warrant of a justice of peace, (j) See ante, p. 560, note (g). It is doubtful whether the old rule has not lapsed with the change of the law as to the trial of accessories, ante, p. 130. The rule as to rescue of traitors was different, all being accessories in treason.

levied, &c., and that the defendant rescued them, is not sufficient.

(v) 2 Hawk. c. 21, s. 6. 4 Bl. Com. 130.

granted upon a certificate of the clerk of the peace of the county, reciting that a true bill for misdemeanor had been found against the party apprehended, and it was objected that the warrant was illegal, as justices of peace had only authority to issue warrants upon oath made of the facts, which authorised the issuing such warrants (w), it was held that the warrant was legal, and that the prisoner was guilty of a misdemeanor, in assisting in the rescue of the person apprehended under it (x).

It was a misdemeanor at common law to aid a person to escape from custody, who was confined under the remand of Commissioners for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, and not on any criminal charge (y).

The rescue of a prisoner committed by the judges of any of the superior Courts is said to be a great misprision; for which the party and the prisoner (if assenting) will be liable to be punished by imprisonment for life, forfeiture of lands for life, and forfeiture of goods and chattels, though no stroke or blow was given (z).

Aiding and assisting a prisoner to escape out of prison, by whatever means it may be effected, is an offence of a mischievous nature, and an obstruction to the course of justice: and the assisting a felon in making an actual escape, is felony (a). In a case which underwent elaborate discussion, the Court of King's Bench held, that a person who assisted the escape from prison of a prisoner who had been convicted of felony within clergy, and, having been sentenced to be transported for seven years, was in custody under such sentence, was an accessory after the fact to the felony (b). The Court proceeded upon the ground that one so convicted of felony, within the benefit of clergy, and sentenced to be transported for seven years, continued a felon till actual transportation and service pursuant to the sentence; and that the assistance given amounted, in law, to receiving, harbouring, or comforting, such felon (c). But they held the indictment to be defective, in not charging that the defendant knew that the principal was guilty, or convicted, of felony (d). The offence of aiding a prisoner to escape out of prison appears also to have been considered as an accessorial offence in cases of piracy (e).

By the Prison Escape Act, 1742 (16 Geo. II. c. 31), s. 3 (f), it is enacted

P., so being in custody as aforesaid, to make his escape out of the said gaol.' But any assistance given to one known to be a felon, in order to hinder his suffering the punishment to which he is condemned, is a sufficient receipt to make a man an accessory after the fact. Ante, p. 126.

(f) Ss. 1, 2 of this Act were repealed in 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 1), so far as they related to prisons to which that Act applied. The Act of 1823 (repealed by the Prison Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 126, s. 73)) did not apply to Bethlehem Hospital or Bridewell, nor to Millbank and Gloucester Penitentiaries, nor to ships or vessels provided for the reception and employment of convicts sentenced to transportation. 5 Geo.

By the Criminal Lunatic Asylums Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 75), s. 12, 'any person who rescues any person ordered to be conveyed to any asylum for criminal lunatics during the time of his conveyance thereto or of his confinement therein, and any officer or servant in any asylum for criminal lunatics who through wilful neglect or connivance permits any person confined therein to escape therefrom (jj), or secretes, or abets or connives at the escape of any such person, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding four years (k), or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, at the discretion of the Court; and any such officer or servant who carelessly allows any such person to escape as aforesaid shall, on summary conviction before two justices of such offence, forfeit any sum not exceeding twenty pounds nor less than two pounds.'

IV. c. 84, s. 1; c. 85, s. 27. Of the expected prisons, Millbank and Gloucester, the King's Bench, Fleet, Marshalsea, and Palace Court Prisons have ceased to exist. Since the abolition of transportation, hulks are not used. The present Bethlehem Hospital is not on the site of the old hospital, and is not used as an asylum for criminal lunatics, and Bridewell is used only for apprentices. The repeal of 4 Geo. Naval and Military Prisons.—The Naval Discipline Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109), ss. 70, 82 (l), imposes penalties on persons aiding escape or attempts to escape from a naval prison (m). These provisions are not limited to the United Kingdom.

The Army Act (n) provides for the punishment on conviction by court-martial of persons subject to military law who wilfully, and without proper authority, release, or wilfully or without reasonable excuse allow the escape of prisoners in their custody or charge (s. 20), or who being in lawful custody escape or attempt to escape (s. 22) (o).

Local Prisons.—By the Prison Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 126), s. 37, 'Every person who aids any prisoner in escaping or attempting to escape from any prison, or who, with intent to facilitate the escape of any prisoner, conveys or causes to be conveyed into any prison any mask, dress, or other disguise, or any letter, or any other article or thing (p), shall be guilty of felony, and on conviction be sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour for a term not exceeding two years' (q).

This section is not limited to criminal prisoners, i.e., prisoners 'charged with or convicted of crime' (s. 4) (r).

Certified Reformatories, &c.—Escaping or aiding escape from reformatories and industrial schools is punishable on summary conviction (8 Edw. VII. c. 7, s. 72). As to aiding the escape of prisoners being conveyed under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, see 44 & 45 Vict. c. 69, ss. 25, 28.

The following decisions on the superseded but similar Acts of 1742 and 1823 may be of value in construing sect. 37 of the Act of 1865. The Act of 1742 only applied where an escape was actually made (s), and was limited to escapes of prisoners committed to or detained in prison, for treason or felony plainly expressed in the warrant of commitment (t).

Delivering instruments to a prisoner, to facilitate his escape from prison, was within the Act of 1742, though the prisoner had been pardoned for the offence of which he was convicted, on condition of transportation (u). And a prisoner was within the Act, though there be no evidence that he knew of what specific offence the person he assisted had been convicted (v).

(m) Penal servitude, three to fourteen years, or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not over two years. The prisons are appointed and governed under s. 81 of the Act of 1866, as amended by 47 & 48 Vict. c. 39.

(q) This Act does not extend to Scotland or Ireland, or convict prisons, or any military or naval prison (s. 3). 'Prison' shall mean gaol, house of correction, bridge-well, or penitentiary; it shall also include the airing grounds, or other grounds or buildings occupied by prison officers, for the use of the prison and contiguous thereto. 'Gaoler' shall mean governor, keeper, or other chief officer of a prison (s. 4). 'Prisoner' is defined for the purposes of the Prison Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 21), as 'any person committed to prison on remand or for trial, safe custody, punishment, or otherwise.' The Act applies (s. 3) to all prisons belonging to a prison authority as defined by the Act of 1865. The definition of 'prisoner' is wide enough to include penal servitude prisoners for the time being detained in a local prison.

(r) Connivance for reward at the escape from prison of a person in civil custody entails liability on the gaoler to loss of office, inability to serve again, and a penalty of £500. 8 & 9 Will. III. c. 27, s. 4.

(v) Ibid. An indictment at common law for aiding a prisoner's escape should state

When the record of the conviction of the prisoner, whose escape was to have been effected, had been produced by the proper officer, no evidence was admissible to contradict what it stated; nor to shew that it had never been filed among the records of the county; notwithstanding that the indictment referred to it with a prout patet as remaining amongst those records (w).

Where a count stated that the gaol thereafter mentioned, situate at the parish of the Holy Trinity, in C., in the county of W., was a gaol to which the provisions of 4 Geo. IV. c. 64 (x) extended, and that one T. was a prisoner in the said gaol, and that the defendant, at the parish aforesaid, feloniously did aid and assist T., then and there being such prisoner, in attempting to escape from the said gaol; it was held on error that the count was good, though it did not allege the means by which the defendant aided T. in attempting to escape, and though it did not allege in direct terms that T. did attempt to escape (y). Another count stated that T., being a prisoner in the said gaol, so situate as aforesaid, was meditating and endeavouring to effect his escape from the said gaol, otherwise than by due course of law, and in order thereto had procured a key to be made with intent to effect his escape by means thereof, and had made to the defendant, then being a turnkey of the said gaol, overtures to induce him to aid him to escape from the said gaol, and so was endeavouring to procure his escape from the said gaol, and that the defendant whilst T. was such prisoner in the said gaol at the parish aforesaid, &c., feloniously did procure and receive into his possession the said key, being adapted to and capable of opening divers locks in the said gaol, with intent thereby to enable T. to escape from the said gaol, and so the jurors said that the defendant at the parish aforesaid feloniously did aid and assist T. in attempting to escape from the said gaol; and it was held that the introductory part of the count stated an attempt to escape and the means used with sufficient particularity, and sufficiently shewed an offence within 4 Geo. IV. c. 64, and that the count was not bad for want of a more particular venue to the acts charged in the introductory part as an attempt by T. to escape, and that the count was not double (z). It was also held, that the general averment of the gaol being a gaol to which the provisions of 4 Geo. IV. c. 64 applied was sufficient, without shewing how it came within them, and that it was not necessary to shew more particularly that the gaol was a gaol for the county within 5 & 6 Vict. c. 110, s. 2 (a). It was further held, that aiding an escape was a substantive offence under 4 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 43 (rep.), and therefore the count was not bad in charging the accessory without including the principal or alleging that he had been convicted, and at all events such an objection was too late after the trial (b). It was also held, that it was not necessary to shew that the prosecution was commenced within a year after the offence, as required by sect. 4 of the Act of 1742 (c).

OF ESCAPE OR BEING AT LARGE, WHILE UNDER SENTENCE OF PENAL SERVITUDE ; AND OF RESCUING OR AIDING THE ESCAPE OF PERSONS UNDER SUCH SENTENCE.

ON the substitution of penal servitude for transportation (a), certain of the legislation as to transportation was applied mutatis mutandis to persons under sentence of penal servitude.

The Transportation Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 67), s. 2, authorises the removal of persons under sentence or order of transportation within Great Britain from the prison in which they are confined to any other of His Majesty's prisons in England (b).

By the Convict Prisons Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 39), power is given to a Secretary of State to appoint not less than three fit persons as directors of Parkhurst and Pentonville Prisons, and of the places for the confinement of male offenders under sentence or order of transportation. The directors so appointed took over the powers and duties in England of the superintendent of convicts under the Act of 1824, and of the visitors of Parkhurst Prison (c), and the commissioners of Portland (d).

The Convict Prisons Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 121), extends to females the provisions of the Act of 1824, as to places of confinement for males (e).

By the Prison Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 41), s. 1, the Prison Commissioners appointed under the Prison Act, 1877, for local prisons were made virtute officii directors of convict prisons.

By the Penal Servitude Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 99), s. 6, ' Every person who under this Act shall be sentenced or ordered to be kept in penal servitude may, during the term of the sentence or order, be confined in any such prison or place of confinement in any part of the United Kingdom, or in any river, port, or harbour of the United Kingdom, in which persons under sentence or order of transportation may now by law be confined, or in any other prison in the United Kingdom, or in any part of his Majesty's dominions beyond the seas, or in any port or harbour thereof, as one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state may from time to time direct ; and such person may during such term be kept to hard labour and otherwise dealt with in all respects as persons

(b) The Act also deals with the removal from Ireland of male offenders sentenced to ' transportation.'

(c) Escape and rescue from Parkhurst is specially punishable under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 82, ss. 12, 13, 14. The prison is now used for invalid and weak-minded convicts.

(d) Escape and rescue from Pentonville is specially punishable under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 29, ss. 24, 25, 28. The prison is not now used as a convict establishment.

(e) The Act recites 5 Geo. IV. c. 84 ; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28, since rep. ; and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 39, supra.

sentenced to transportation may now by law be dealt with while so confined.'

Sect. 7. 'All Acts and provisions of Acts now applicable with respect to persons under sentence or order of transportation shall, so far as may be consistent with the express provisions of this Act, be construed to extend and be applicable to persons under any sentence or order of penal servitude under this Act; and all the powers and provisions contained in the Transportation Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. c. 82), authorising the appointment by his Majesty from time to time of places of confinement as therein mentioned for male offenders under sentence or order of transportation, and authorising his Majesty to order male offenders convicted in Great Britain and under sentence or order of transportation to be kept to hard labour in any part of his Majesty's dominions out of England, shall extend and be applicable to and for the appointment by his Majesty of like places of confinement in any part of the United Kingdom for offenders (whether male or female) sentenced under this Act in any part of the United Kingdom, and to and for the ordering of such offenders to be kept to hard labour in any part of his Majesty's dominions out of England; and all the provisions of the said Act concerning the removal to or from and confinement in the places of confinement in or out of England, appointed under the said Act, of the offenders therein mentioned, and all Acts and provisions of Acts now in force concerning or relating to the regulation and government of such places of confinement, and the custody, treatment, management, and control of or otherwise in relation to the offenders confined therein, shall, so far as the same may be consistent with the express provisions of the Act, extend and be applicable to and for the removal to and from and confinement in the places of confinement appointed under this Act of the offenders sentenced in any part of the United Kingdom, and otherwise be applicable to and in respect of such places of confinement and the offenders to be confined therein' (f).

The Penal Servitude Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 3), s. 3, after reciting that the provisions applicable to persons under sentence of transportation extend to persons under penal servitude only when they are conveyed to and kept in places of confinement appointed under the Transportation Act, 1824, and that it is expedient to extend the provisions, enacts that 'any person now or hereafter under sentence or order of penal servitude may, during the term of the sentence or order, be conveyed to any place or places beyond the seas to which offenders under sentence or order of transportation may be conveyed, or to any place or places beyond the seas which may be hereafter appointed as herein mentioned; and all Acts and provisions now applicable to and for the removal and transportation of offenders under sentence or order of transportation to and from any places beyond the seas, and concerning their custody, management, and control, and the property in their services, and the punishment of such offenders if at large without lawful cause before the expiration of their sentence, and all other provisions now applicable to and in the case of persons under sentence or order of transportation, shall apply to and in the case of persons under sentence or order of penal servitude, as if they were persons under sentence or order of transportation' (g).

Sect. 6. 'Where in any enactment now in force the expression "any crime punishable with transportation," or "any crime punishable by law with transportation," or any expression of the like import, is used, the enactment shall be construed and take effect as applicable also to any crime punishable with penal servitude' (h).

Army and Navy.—By sect. 58 of the Army Act (i), when a person subject to military law is convicted by court-martial and sentenced to penal servitude, such conviction and sentence shall have the same effect as if such person had been convicted in the United Kingdom of an offence punishable by penal servitude and sentenced to penal servitude by a competent civil court, and 'all enactments relating to a person sentenced to penal servitude by a competent civil court shall so far as circumstances admit apply accordingly.' By the Naval Discipline Act (j), like provision is made as to persons subject to naval discipline.

The following portions of the Transportation Acts with respect to the escape of convicts appear to be applied by the Acts of 1853 and 1857 :

By the Transportation Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. c. 84), s. 15, offenders removed under the Act are put in the custody of a superintendent and overseer, who during the term of his custody have 'the same powers over him as are incident to the office of a sheriff or gaoler, and shall in like manner be answerable for any escape of such offender' (k).

By sect. 22, 'If any offender who shall have been or shall be so sentenced or ordered to be transported or banished (l), or who shall have agreed or shall agree to transport or banish himself or herself on certain conditions (m), either for life or any number of years, under the provisions of this or any former Act, shall be afterwards at large within any part of his Majesty's dominions, without some lawful cause, before the expiration of the term for which such offender shall have been sentenced or ordered to be transported or banished, or shall have so agreed to transport or banish himself or herself, every such offender so being at large, being thereof lawfully convicted, shall suffer death, as in cases of felony, without the benefit of clergy (n) : and such offender may be tried either in the county or place where he or she shall be apprehended, or in that from whence he or she was ordered to be transported or banished ; and if any

The present punishment under s. 22 is penal servitude for life, or not less than three years, or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not more than two years (54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212). See R. v. Lamb, 3 C. & K. 96. 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 67, except as to the maximum (life), was repealed in 1888 and 1892 (S. L. R.). person shall rescue, or attempt to rescue, or assist in rescuing or attempting to rescue, any such offender from the custody of such superintendent or overseer, or of any sheriff or gaoler, or other person conveying, removing, transporting, or reconveying him or her, or shall convey, or cause to be conveyed, any disguise, instrument for effecting escape, or arms, to such offender, every such offence shall be punishable in the same manner as if such offender had been confined in a gaol or prison, in the custody of the sheriff (o) or gaoler, for the crime of which such offender shall have been convicted; and whoever shall discover and prosecute to conviction any such offender so being at large within this kingdom, shall be entitled to a reward of twenty pounds for every such offender so convicted' (p). The word 'feloniously' is essential in an indictment under this section (q).

By sect. 23, 'In any indictment against any offender for being found at large, contrary to the provisions of this or of any other Act now made, or hereafter to be made; and also in any indictment against any person who shall rescue, or attempt to rescue, or assist in rescuing, any such offender from such custody, or who shall convey, or cause to be conveyed, any disguise, instrument for effecting escape, or arms, to any such offender, contrary to the provisions of this or of any other Act now made, or hereafter to be made, whether such offender shall have been tried before any Court or judge, within or without the United Kingdom, or before any naval or military court-martial, it shall be sufficient to charge and allege the order made for the transportation or banishment of such offender, without charging or alleging any indictment, trial, conviction, judgment, or sentence, or any pardon or intention of mercy, or signification thereof, or of against, or in any manner relating to such offender.'

By sect. 24, 'The Clerk of the Court or other officer having the custody of the records of the Court (r), where such sentence or order of transportation or banishment shall have been passed or made, shall, at the request of any person on his Majesty's behalf, make out and give a certificate in writing, signed by him, containing the effect and substance only (s) (omitting the formal part) of every indictment and conviction of such offender, and of the sentence or order for his or her transportation or banishment (not taking for the same more than six shillings and eightpence), which certificate shall be sufficient evidence of the conviction and sentence, or order for the transportation or banishment of such offender; and every such certificate, if made by the clerk or officer of any Court in Great Britain, shall be received in evidence, upon proof of the signature and official character of the person signing the same (t); and every such certificate, if made by the clerk or officer of any Court out of Great Britain, shall be received in evidence, if verified by the seal of the Court, or by the signature of the judge, or one of the judges of the Court, without further proof' (u).

In the following cases certificates have been held sufficiently to comply with the terms of sect. 24.

(a) A certificate stating that the prisoner had been convicted of two larcenies and sentenced to two several terms of transportation of seven years each for the said larcenies (v).

(b) A certificate that the prisoner was 'in due form of law convicted of feloniously and burglariously breaking and entering the dwelling-house of T. D. and feloniously and burglariously stealing therein one piece of the current gold coin,' &c., and 'was thereupon ordered to be transported beyond the seas for the term of his natural life' (w).

(c) A certificate that the prisoner 'at the general quarter sessions of the peace of our Lady the Queen, holden at M. in the county of K., the prisoner was in due form of law tried and convicted' (x).

It would seem that even if the certificate states that a sentence was imposed in excess of the powers of the Court of trial, the sentence cannot be treated as a nullity, but must be regarded as valid until quashed or reversed (y).

There are several decisions as to the effect of pardons (z) conditional on the convict transporting himself (a). Under the present law a person sentenced to penal servitude but pardoned on condition of leaving the realm would seem to be liable to conviction under sect. 22, if he returned in breach of the conditions.

Prisoners outside the United Kingdom.—The Penal Servitude Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 3), s. 4, preserves the powers of the Transportation Act, 1824 (b), as to appointing places beyond the seas to which offenders under sentence or order of penal servitude may be conveyed. But the powers are not in use as to persons sentenced in the United Kingdom.

By the Convict Prisons Abroad Act, 1859 (22 Vict. c. 25), ss. 13–19, provision is made for the trial and punishment of convicts or others concerned in escapes or rescues. The Act applies to convict prisons at Bermuda and Gibraltar, and other places appointed by His Majesty (sect. 2).

The Colonial Prisoners Removal Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 10), provides for the removal of prisoners under sentence from one colony to another to complete the sentence. The removed prisoner is liable to the laws and regulations of the colony to which he is removed.

CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.

OF COMPOUNDING OFFENCES.

AGREEMENTS not to prosecute or to stifle a prosecution for a criminal offence are in certain cases criminal (a). This offence is distinct from that of misprision of felony (b).

It was said by Lord Westbury in Williams v. Bayley (c), ‘If you are aware that a crime has been committed you shall not convert that crime into a source of profit or benefit to yourself. . . . Now, that is the principle of the law and the policy of the law, and it is dictated by the highest considerations. If men were permitted to trade upon the knowledge of a crime, and to convert their privity to that crime into an occasion of advantage, no doubt a great legal and a great moral offence would be committed, and that is what I apprehend the old rule of law intended to convey when it embodied the principle under the words which have now somewhat passed into desuetude, viz., misprision of felony. That was a case where a man, instead of performing his public duty and giving information to the public authorities of a crime that he was aware of, concealed his knowledge, and further converted it into a source of emolument for himself.’ In the last words Lord Westbury seems to be confusing misprision of felony with compounding of felony. That offence (in the earlier books described as theft-bote) is committed where the party robbed not only knows the felon, but also takes his goods again, or other amends, upon agreement not to prosecute (d). It is said to have been anciently punishable as felony; but is now punished as a misdemeanor by fine and (or) imprisonment, unless it is accompanied with such degree of maintenance given to the felon as to make the party an accessory after the fact (e). But merely to take back one’s own goods which have been stolen, is no offence at all unless some favour be shewn to the thief (f).

The offence of compounding a felony applies to all felonies, and is not limited to larceny.

Where an indictment for compounding felony alleged that after taking a sum of money for compounding, the defendant desisted from prosecuting, and it appeared that he did prosecute to conviction, the defendant was held entitled to be acquitted (g). But an indictment which did not allege that the defendant desisted from prosecution has been held good (h). The offence of compounding a larceny may be committed by a person other than the owner of the stolen goods or a material witness for the prosecution (i).

(a) It is well recognised that agreements not to prosecute a felony or misdemeanor are illegal and unenforceable. See Fivaz v. Nicholls, 2 C. B. 501. Rawlings v. Coal Consumers’ Association, 43 L. J. M. C. 111. Windhill Local Board v. Vint, 45 Ch. D. 351.

By sect. 101 of the Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96) (j), it is felony to take any reward for helping a person to any property stolen or obtained by false pretences; and by sect. 102 to advertise a reward for the return of things stolen, involves a forfeiture of fifty pounds (k).

Compounding Misdemeanors.—It is not certain whether an agreement to stifle a prosecution for misdemeanor is indictable apart from conspiracy (l).

An agreement to prevent or put an end to a prosecution for misdemeanor is void and unenforceable as impeding the course of public justice (m). It is immaterial whether the agreement is made with the defendant or with a third party (n). When an indictment has been found the prosecution may be terminated by nolle prosequi entered by leave of the Attorney-General, or by leave of the Court (n). Sometimes after verdict a prosecution is abandoned, with the sanction of the Court, in cases where the offence principally and more immediately affects an individual; the defendant being permitted to speak with the prosecutor before any judgment is pronounced, and a trivial punishment being inflicted if the prosecutor declares himself satisfied (o). In a case of an indictment for ill-treating a parish apprentice, a security for the fair expenses of the prosecution given by the defendant after conviction, upon an understanding that the Court would abate the period of his imprisonment, was held good, upon the ground that it was given with the sanction of the Court, and to be considered as part of the punishment suffered by the defendant in expiation of his offence, in addition to the imprisonment inflicted on him (p).

In Keir v. Leeman (q) it was laid down, that ‘the law will permit a compromise of all offences, though made the subject of a criminal prosecution, for which offences the injured party might recover damages in an action.’ But it seems that this proposition should be limited to the ‘cases where the private rights of the injured party are made the subject of agreement, and where by the previous conviction of the defendant the rights of the public are also preserved inviolate’ (r). For ‘when a verdict of guilty is taken, and the Court suspend judgment, and allow the questions between the parties to be referred, the matter is very different, for then it is only to enable the Court the better to see what sentence ought to be given '(s). ' But if the offence is of a public nature no agreement can be valid that is founded on the consideration of stifling a prosecution for it '(t). A contract therefore to withdraw a prosecution for perjury, and to give no evidence against the accused, is founded on an illegal consideration and void (u).

So where an action was brought on an agreement, by which the defendants, in consideration that the plaintiff, being the prosecutor of an indictment against certain persons for an assault and riot, would not proceed further on such indictment, promised the plaintiff to pay him a certain sum of money, and in pursuance of that agreement the plaintiff did not proceed further with the indictment, and informed the Court, before which the indictment was pending, of the premises, and, by leave of the Court, forbore to give evidence upon the indictment, and thereupon there was an acquittal; it was held that the agreement was illegal; for the offence was not confined to the personal injury, but was accompanied with a riot, which was a matter of public concern, and therefore not legally the subject of compromise (v).

In one case an indictment for a nuisance by making an embankment in the Thames, whereby the navigation was obstructed, was referred (w); but the question of the legality of the reference was not raised. But where an indictment had been preferred against the defendant for non-repair of a highway, which it was alleged he ought to have repaired ratione tenuræ; the prosecutor and defendant before the trial agreed to leave the question of liability to repair to reference; the arbitrator was to make an award on the evidence adduced before him; a verdict was to be entered according to the result of the award, and the arbitrator awarded that the defendant was guilty of the non-repair alleged in the indictment: it was held that the reference was illegal, as the question of liability to repair was of public concern (x).

Where indictments for perjury and conspiracy were removed into the Queen's Bench, and on the indictment for perjury coming on for trial, it was agreed, under the advice of counsel, that no evidence should be tendered, a verdict of not guilty taken on both indictments, and that all matters in difference between the prosecutor and defendant should be referred to a barrister; it was held that it would have been illegal to refer the indictment for perjury, and, as it would seem, the indictment for conspiracy; but that the indictments were not referred, and the verdicts of acquittal must at all events stand; and that there was nothing illegal in referring all matters in difference and at the same time consenting to verdicts of acquittal, unless there was a corrupt cludes 'a criminal proceeding by the Crown' from the powers of the Court to refer causes or matters for inquiry or report (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49, s. 13 (1)). The Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. c. 23), s. 9, authorises the Court of Criminal Appeal to order reference of certain kinds of matters arising on a criminal appeal to a commissioner for inquiry and report. Vide post, Bk. xii. c. iv.

agreement to stifle the prosecution, which did not appear to be the fact (y).

It is clear that the consent of the Court cannot make an agreement to abandon a prosecution valid, if it would otherwise be unlawful (z).

Informations on Penal Statutes.—The compounding of informations on penal statutes is a misdemeanor against public justice, by contributing to make the laws odious to the people (a). Therefore in order to discourage malicious informers, and to provide that offences, when once discovered, shall be duly prosecuted, it was enacted in 1575 by 18 Eliz. c. 5, s. 4 (b), that an informer shall not compound or agree with any person accused of contravening a penal statute without the leave of the Court (sect. 4), and that if any person shall offend in making of composition or other misdemeanor contrary to the true intent and meaning of this statute, or shall ‘by colour or pretence or process, or without process upon colour or pretence of any matter of offence against any penal law, make any composition, or take any money, reward, or promise of reward for himself as to the use of any other’ without the order or consent of some Court, he shall on lawful conviction stand two hours in the pillory (c), be for ever disabled to sue on any popular or penal statute, and shall forfeit ten pounds (sect. 5). This statute extends even to those penal actions where the whole penalty is given to the prosecutor (d). But it does not apply to penalties only recoverable by information before justices (e).

In a case where it was held that threatening, by letter or otherwise, to put in motion a prosecution by a public officer, to recover penalties for selling Fryer’s Balsam without a stamped label (f), for the purpose of obtaining money to stay the prosecution (not being such a threat as a firm and prudent man might not be expected to resist), was not in itself an indictable offence at common law, though it was alleged that money was obtained, it seems to have been considered that such an offence would be indictable under 18 Eliz. c. 5, s. 5 (g). But no indictment for any attempt to commit such a statutable misdemeanor can be sustained as a misdemeanor at common law, without bringing the offence intended within, and laying it to be against, the statute. Though if the party so threatened had been alleged to be guilty of the offence imputed, within the statute imposing the duty and creating the penalty, such an attempt to compound and stifle a public prosecution for the sake of private lucre, in fraud of the revenue, and against the policy of the statute (which gives the penalty as auxiliary to the revenue, and in furtherance of public justice for the sake of example), might also, upon general principles, have been deemed a sufficient ground on which to have sustained the judgment at common law (h).

(y) R. v. Hardey, 14 Q.B. 529. In R. v. Bardell, 5 A. & E. 619, an indictment for conspiracy was referred. The lawfulness of the reference was not discussed, and the question argued was whether the reference was revocable under the Arbitration Act of 1833 (3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42). The Act of 1889, as already stated, does not apply to criminal proceedings by the Crown.

A party is liable to the punishment prescribed by 18 Eliz. c. 5, s. 5, for taking the penalty imposed by a penal statute, even if there is no action or proceeding for the penalty. The prisoner applied to one R., and demanded five pounds, as a penalty which R. had incurred under the General Turnpike Act, by suffering his waggon to be drawn on a turnpike road by more than four horses. R. had incurred such a penalty, and the prisoner obtained the money by way of composition to prevent any legal proceedings; no process had been sued out, and no information had been laid before a magistrate. The prisoner having been convicted, judgment was respited, upon a doubt whether the offence was within the statute, so as to subject the prisoner to the specific punishment therein prescribed, inasmuch as no action or proceeding was depending in which the order or consent of any Court in Westminster Hall for a composition could have been obtained. But the judges were all of opinion that the conviction was right, and that the statute applies to all cases of taking a penalty incurred, or pretended to be incurred, without leave of a Court at Westminster, or without judgment or conviction (i).

A person may be convicted under 18 Eliz. c. 5, s. 5, for taking money upon colour or pretence of a party having committed an offence, though in fact no offence liable to a penalty has been committed by the person from whom the money is taken (j). CANADIAN NOTES.

OF COMPOUNDING OFFENCES AND STIFLING PROSECUTIONS.

Corrupting Witnesses, Jurymen, Accepting Bribes and Otherwise Obstructing Justice.—Code sec. 180.

An indictment or charge that the accused paid money to a person not to attend a Court of Revision in connection with an election, does not disclose a “perversion or defeat of justice” under Code sec. 180(d), where it does not shew any ground for supposing that the non-attendance would defeat justice, and where the person receiving the money was the person whose right to vote was in question and might therefore abandon his claim. The offence disclosed may properly be charged under sub-sec. (a) of Code sec. 180 as an attempt to dissuade a person by a bribe from giving evidence. R. v. Lake, 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 37.

Any attempt to corrupt or influence a jury by money, promises, letters, threats or persuasions, except only by the strength of the evidence and the argument of the counsel in open Court at the trial of the cause, constituted the common law offence of embracery, whether the jurors gave any verdict or not and whether the verdict given were true or false. R. v. Cornellier, 29 C.L.J. 69.

It is provided by the Canada Temperance Act, R.S.C. (1906) ch. 152, sec. 150, that everyone who on any prosecution under that Act or any Act in force in any province in respect of the issue of licenses for the sale of fermented or spirituous liquors, or under the Temperance Act of 1864, tampers with a witness, either before or after he is summoned or appears as such witness, or by the offer of money, or by threats, or in any other way, either directly or indirectly, induces or attempts to induce any such witness to absent himself or to swear falsely shall incur a penalty of fifty dollars for each offence. This special provision is not affected by the Code. R. v. Gibson, 29 N.S.R. 88.

A conviction may be made under this section of the Code for dissuading a person by corrupt means from giving evidence under the Ontario Liquor License Act. R. v. Holland, 14 C.L.T. Notes 294.

It is an offence under Code sec. 180(a) to attempt to dissuade a witness by bribery or other corrupt means to give in lieu of the witness's own belief that version of the facts which the person making the corrupt offer believed to be the truth. R. v. Silverman, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 79.

Compounding Penal Actions.—See Code sec. 181.

The compounding of an information on penal statutes is a misdemeanour against public justice by contributing to make the laws odious to the people. Therefore in order to discourage malicious informers, and to provide that when offences are once discovered they shall be prosecuted, 18 Eliz. ch. 5 was passed, providing a fine upon an informer for taking money to settle the charge. But that statute did not apply to penalties which are only recoverable by information before justices, and an indictment for making a composition in such a case was held bad in arrest of judgment. R. v. Mason, 17 U.C.C.P. 534.

The receipt of money in consideration of the non-prosecution of a charge for the infraction of liquor laws is indictable as compounding a misdemeanour of a public nature. Re Fraser, 1 C.L.J. 326; R. v. Mabey, 37 U.C.Q.B. 248.

If the agreement be upon the understanding that the accused shall be discharged from custody, although not so stated in express terms, it is illegal and void. Leggatt v. Brown, 29 O.R. 530, 30 O.R. 225.

The assent of the magistrate to the charge being withdrawn on being informed of the agreement of settlement does not validate the agreement.

Where the charge is for an offence against the public as distinguished from offences which, although punishable by criminal process are essentially in the nature of private injuries, it is immaterial that the offence charged was not a felony before the abolition of the distinction between felony and misdemeanour by the Criminal Code.

Although a person who has parted with his money or property by means of a fraud practised upon him or who has had it stolen from him, is entitled to take his own property if offered to him, he is not permitted to screen the offender by an agreement not to prosecute nor to drop a prosecution already begun. Morgan v. McFee, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 308.

Obtaining money by false pretences is a crime committed against the public as well as against the individual defrauded, and an agreement between the latter and the accused to settle the charge pending before the magistrate is void.

A contract between the accused and the complainant made in consideration of the withdrawal of a charge of obtaining money by false pretences in respect of which a preliminary enquiry was pending before a magistrate is not enforceable, although the criminal proceedings were dropped in pursuance of the contract. Morgan v. McFee, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 308.

Corruptly Taking Reward Without Bringing Offender to Trial.—See Code sec. 182.

Advertising Reward and Immunity for Offender Where Property Stolen.—See Code sec. 183.

A prosecution taken against the proprietor of a “newspaper” for publishing an advertisement offering a reward for the recovery of stolen property under paragraph (d) must be commenced within six months from the commission of the offence. Sec. 1140(d).

CHAPTER THE NINTH.

OF BARRATRY, MAINTENANCE, CHAMPERTY, AND BUYING AND SELLING PRETENDED TITLES AND EMBRACERY.

SECT. I.—BARRATRY.

THE common law and early legislation were hostile 'to the traffic of merchandising in quarrels, of huckstering in litigious discord' (a). One form of such traffic is common barratry, which is a misdemeanor at common law (b).

A common barrator is defined to be 'a common mover, exciter, or maintainer of suits, quarrels, in courts of record, or other courts, as the county court, and the like; or in the country, by taking and keeping possession of lands in controversy, by all kinds of disturbance of the peace, or by spreading false rumours and calumnies whereby discord and disquiet may grow among neighbours' (c). But one act of this description will not make anyone a common barrator, as it is necessary in an indictment for this offence to charge the defendant with being a common barrator, which is a term of art appropriated by law to this crime (d). It has been held that a man shall not be adjudged a barrator in respect of any number of false actions brought by him in his own right (e); but this is doubted, in case such actions be merely groundless and vexatious, without any manner of colour, and brought only with a design to oppress the defendants (f).

The offence is now rarely prosecuted. The most recent instance occurred in 1889, viz., a prosecution for stirring up a series of fraudulent actions for damages against a railway company (g).

It is not barratry for a solicitor to maintain a party in a groundless action, to the commencing whereof the solicitor was in no way privy (h). It seems to have been held that a feme covert could not be indicted as a common barrator (i); but this is doubtful (j).

(j) 1 Hawk. c. 81, s. 6.

Indictment.—An indictment for this offence may be in a general form, stating the defendant to be a common barrator (k), without shewing any particular facts: but it is clearly settled that the prosecutor must, before the trial, give the defendant a note of the particular acts of barratry which he intends to prove against him; and that, if he omit to do so, the Court will not suffer him to proceed in the trial of the indictment (l). And the prosecutor will be confined to his note of particulars, and will not be at liberty to give evidence of any other acts of barratry than those which are therein stated (m).

It seems never to have been necessary to describe the offence as committed at any certain place, as from its nature it involves a repetition of several acts which may have been in different places (n).

Jurisdiction.—The statute 34 Edw. III. c. 1, authorises the justices to restrain rioters and all other barrators, and to pursue, arrest, take and chastise them according to their trespass and offence, and to cause them to be imprisoned and duly punished, according to the law and customs of the realm, and according to that which to them shall seem best by their discretions and good advisement (o), and barratry seems accordingly to be triable at greater sessions (p).

Punishment.—The punishment for this offence in common persons is by fine and imprisonment (q), and binding them to their good behaviour; and in persons of any profession relating to the law, a further punishment by being disabled to practise for the future (r).

SECT. II.—FRIVOLOUS ARRESTS.

To cause any person to be arrested or attached in the name of a fictitious plaintiff or of a person who is ignorant of and has not authorised the proceeding is criminal (s). The offence, if committed in respect of proceedings in a superior Court, appears to be punishable as a contempt. If committed in proceedings in inferior local Courts of record, it is punishable summarily by imprisonment (t).

SECT. III.—MAINTENANCE (u).

Earlier and later opinions as to what constitutes maintenance are not in harmony (v). According to Coke (w), ‘maintenance signifieth in law a taking in hand, bearing-up or upholding of a quarrel or side, to the disturbance or hindrance of common right.’ This definition seems to be based on 1 Edw. III. stat. 2, c. 14 (1327), which declares that ‘because the King desireth that common right be administered to all persons, as well poor as rich, he commandeth and defendeth that none of his counsellors, nor of his house, nor none other of his ministers, nor no great man of the realm by himself nor by other, by sending of letters nor otherwise, nor none other in this land great or small, shall take upon them to maintain quarrels or parties in the country to the let and disturbance of the common law’ (x).

By 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9, s. 3 (1540), it is enacted, that ‘no person or persons of what estate, degree, or condition soever he or they be, do hereafter unlawfully retain for maintenance of any suit or plea any person or persons upon pain of forfeiture of ten pounds, recoverable by penal action’ (y).

It was considered to be maintenance where a person assisted another in his pretensions to lands, by taking or holding the possession of them for him by force or subtlety, or where a person stirred up quarrels and suits in relation to matters wherein he was in no way concerned (z), or it may be where a person officiously intermeddled in a suit depending in a court of justice, and in no way belonging to him, by assisting either party to a suit with money, or otherwise, in such suit (a). Where there is no contract to have part of the thing in suit, the party so intermeddling is said to be guilty of maintenance generally; but if the party stipulates to have part of the thing in suit, his offence is called champerty (b).

‘Unlawful maintenance is not merely under some circumstances a civil wrong entitling the person injured to damages, but is a wrong

(z) This kind of maintenance is called in the books ruralis (en pais), in distinction to another carried on in courts of justice, and therefore called curialis. It is punishable at the King’s suit by fine and imprisonment, whether the matter in dispute any way depended in plea or not; but is said not to be actionable.

(a) 1 Hawk. c. 83, s. 3. Bac. Abr. tit. ‘Maintenance.’ 4 Bl. Com. 134. This kind of maintenance is called curialis.

(b) Co. Litt. 368. 1 Hawk. c. 83, s. 3, vide post, p. 594. The abuse of legal proceedings by oppressive combinations to carry them into effect is said to have speedily appeared upon the establishment of the laws in the time of Edward I. ‘Instead of their former associations for robbery and violence, men entered into formal combinations to support each other in law suits; and it was found requisite to check this iniquity by Act of Parliament.’ 2 Hume, 320, referring to the ordinance of conspirators. Edw. I. post, p. 595.

founded on a prohibition by statute, which makes it a criminal act and a misdemeanor' (c). It has been held that the statutes relating to maintenance are declaratory of the common law (d). It seems immaterial whether the maintenance is of the plaintiff or of the defendant (e), and a corporation seems to be liable for maintenance as much as an individual, unless it is in liquidation (f). A maintenance is not limited to civil actions at common law: but it is not maintenance to assist another, and in a criminal proceeding (g). But such assistance may amount to malicious prosecution or conspiracy to pervert justice (h).

'The substance of the law is that parties shall not by their countenance aid the prosecution of suits of any kind which every person must bring on his own bottom and at his own expense' (i).

'All our cases of champerty and maintenance are founded on the principle that no encouragement should be given to litigation by the introduction of parties to enforce those rights which others are not disposed to enforce' (j).

Whoever assists another with money to carry on his cause, as by retaining one to be of counsel for him, or otherwise bearing him out in the whole or part of the expense of the suit, may properly be said to be guilty of an act of maintenance (k). It has been said that no one can be guilty of maintenance in respect of any money given by him to another for the purposes of an intended suit, before any suit is actually commenced; but it would seem that this, if not strictly maintenance, must be equally criminal at common law (l). And a person may be as much guilty of maintenance for supporting another after judgment, as for doing it while the plea is pending, because the party grieved may be thereby discouraged from bringing a writ of error or attain (m).

'Maintenance.' 1 Hawk. c. 83, s. 12, where it is said, that if it plainly appear that the money was given merely with a design to assist in the prosecution or defence of an intended suit, which afterwards is actually brought, surely it cannot but be as great a misdemeanor in the nature of the thing and equally criminal at common law as if the money were given after the commencement of the suit; though perhaps it may not in strictness come under the notion of maintenance. Where a declaration alleged that the defendant unlawfully and maliciously did procure, instigate, and stir up one T. to commence and prosecute an action against the plaintiff, wherein certain issues were joined, as to which the plaintiff was acquitted; the Court held that no cause of action appeared, the declaration not shewing maintenance (as the action appeared not to have been commenced when the defendant interfered), and not alleging want of reasonable and probable cause for the action. Flight v. Leman, 4 Q.B. 883. The distinction between instigating a suit and maintaining one already begun seems too narrow. Bradlaugh v. Newdegate, 11 Q.B.D. 1, 8.

Where a declaration alleged that the defendant unlawfully, maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause, and without having any interest in the suit therein mentioned, instigated and stirred Judicial opinion as to what constitutes unlawful maintenance from the point of view of criminal and civil liability has gradually changed (n). The view now accepted is that of Lord Abinger in Findon v. Parker (o): 'The law of maintenance as I understand it upon the modern construction is confined to cases where a man improperly and for the purpose of stirring up litigation and strife encourages others either to bring actions or to make defences which they have no right to make' (p), and the tendency of judicial decision is to attempt to carve out of the old law such remnant as is consistent with modern views of public policy and freedom of trade and contract, and to disregard the ancient definitions: but to recognise that there is such a thing as maintenance in cases of 'wanton and officious intermeddling with the disputes of others in which the defendant has no interest whatever, and where the interest he renders to one or the other party is without justification or excuse' (q).

The following classes of Acts in the nature of maintenance have been held justifiable or excusable or unlawful from the circumstances under which they are done.

Maintenance may be justified by the interest of the maintainer in the suit, i.e., (1) an actual valuable interest in the result of the suit itself as the present, contingent or future, (2) or the interest which consanguinity or affinity to the suitor gives to the man who aids him, or (3) the interest arising from the connection of the parties, e.g. as master and servant, or (4) that which charity and compassion (r) gives a man on behalf of a poor man, who, but for the aid of his richer helper, could not assert his rights, and would be oppressed and overborne in his endeavour to maintain them (s).

In litigation relating to a patent for nickel plating, advertisements inviting persons interested in the nickel plate trade to subscribe towards the expenses of a pending appeal were held not to be open to objection, as the persons invited to subscribe had a common interest with the advertiser (t).

1. Interest.—Not only those who have an actual interest in the thing in dispute, e.g. those who have a reversion expectant on an estate-tail, or a lease for life or years, &c., but also those who have a bare contingency of an interest in the lands in question, which possibly may never vest in possession, and even those who by the act of God have the immediate possibility of such an interest, such as heirs apparent (u), or the husbands of such heirs, though it be in the power of others to bar them, may lawfully maintain another in an action concerning such lands: and if a

up a pauper to commence and prosecute an action against the plaintiff, by reason whereof the pauper did commence and prosecute such action, whereby the plaintiff was put to great trouble and vexation, and obliged to lay out a large sum in the defence of such action; the Court held the declaration good. Pechell v. Watson, 8 M. & W. 691.

(n) Thus the purchase of a chose in action which under the old law amounted to maintenance, is not now so regarded. Fitzroy v. Cave [1905], 2 K.B. 364.

plaintiff in an action of trespass aliene the lands, the alienee may produce evidence to prove that the inheritance at the time of the action was in the plaintiff, because the title is now become his own (v). Also, he who is bound to warrant lands may lawfully maintain the tenant in defence of his title, because he is bound to render other lands to the value of those that shall be evicted. And he who has an equitable interest in lands or goods, or even in a chose in action, as a cestui que trust, or a vendee of lands, &c., or an assignee of a bond for a good consideration, may lawfully maintain a suit concerning the thing in which he has such an equity (w). And wherever any persons claim a common interest in the same thing, as in a way, churchyard, or common, &c., by the same title, they may maintain one another in a suit concerning such thing (x).

Where, on the trial of an action brought to recover the amount of an attorney's bill, in which there was a plea of maintenance, it appeared that Jesus College, Oxford, had given notice to set out tithes in kind to all the owners of old inclosures in the parish of Tredington, who had, as far as living memory went, paid certain sums of money in lieu of tithes for the old inclosures, and that, at a meeting of the owners of such old inclosures, it was agreed by them that they should defend any suit or suits which should be instituted by Jesus College, to enforce the payment of tithes, and that the expenses of such defence should be paid by the owners in proportion to their interests, as ascertained by the poor rate; the owners considering that if Jesus College should succeed in one suit as to any part of the old inclosures, that would invalidate the payments as to all. It was held that the agreement to defend the suits was not maintenance; for, although the payments were not the same per acre, and although the interest in each payment was separate, yet all the owners of the old inclosures had an interest in supporting the moduses over all the old inclosures, and consequently the agreement was not officiously entered into in order to defend the suits (y).

Where a count stated that Y. had deposited a sum of money in plaintiff's hands, which the plaintiff had delivered to the defendant at his request, and that Y., threatening to bring an action against the plaintiff to recover the money, and thereupon, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, would defend any action Y. should commence, the defendant undertook to save the plaintiff harmless; that Y. brought an action to recover the money, and that the plaintiff defended it with the privity and consent of the defendant; it was held that this was not maintenance (z).

Where a member of Parliament procured an informer to sue another member of Parliament for penalties for having sat and voted without being duly qualified, and gave him an indemnity against all costs and expenses, it was held that the member and the informer had no such common interest in the penalty sued for as would be a defence to an action for maintenance (a).

(a) Bradlaugh v. Newdegate, 17 Q.B.D.

H. being interested in certain appliances for the electrical treatment of diseases, employed T. as an expert to report on them, who published a favourable report. H. subsequently instigated T. to sue A. for publishing a newspaper article commenting unfavourably on T.'s report and qualifications. The action failed, and A. sued H. for maintaining it. It was held that H. had no common interest with T. in his action for libel, and was liable for maintenance of that action (b).

The action being for libel in point of law could concern only the person who brought it (c).

Where the defendants, a trading company, obtained contracts for the hire of an apparatus in which the company dealt from customers of the plaintiffs of a rival trading company, and agreed to indemnify the hirers from claims by the plaintiffs for breach of contract, it was held that their contracts of indemnity were given in lawful defence of the commercial interests of the defendants, and that they were not liable for maintenance (d).

At one time not only he who laid out money to assist another in his suit, but even he who by his friendship or interest saved the party an expense which he might otherwise have had to incur, or gave or endeavoured to give any kind of assistance to a party in the management of his suit, was held to be guilty of maintenance (e). But this doctrine is not now accepted (f).

It has been said that he who gives any public countenance to another in relation to his suit is liable for maintenance (g); as if a person of great power and interest says publicly that he will spend a sum of money on one side, or that he will give a sum of money to labour the jury, whether in truth he spend anything or not; or where such a person comes to the bar with one of the parties, and stands by him while his cause is tried, whether he says anything or not; for such practices not only tend to discourage the other party from going on with his cause, but also to intimidate juries from doing their duty (h). But it seems that a bare promise to maintain another is not in itself maintenance, unless it be either in respect of the power of the person who makes it, or of the public manner in which it is made (i). A man is not guilty of an act of maintenance, by giving another friendly advice as to his proper remedy at law, or as to the lawyer likely to do his business most effectually (j).

2. Affinity.—Whoever is of kin, or godfather to either of the parties, or related by any kind of affinity still continuing, may lawfully stand by at the bar and counsel him, and pray another to be of counsel for him; but cannot lawfully lay out his money in the cause, unless he be either father, or son, or heir-apparent, to the party, or husband of such an heiress (k).

3. Tenure.—It seems that a landlord might justify laying out his own money in defence of his tenant's title, where the lands were originally derived from the landlord, but that he could not maintain the tenant in respect of lands not held of himself (l).

4. Service.—A master may pay one to be of counsel for his servant, and may go with him, and stand with him, and aid him at the trial: also it is said, that if the servant be arrested, the master may assist him with money to keep him from prison, that he may have the benefit of his service (m). And a servant cannot lawfully lay out any of his own money to assist the master in his suit (n).

5. Charity.—And one may lawfully give money to a poor man to enable him to carry on his suit (o): and anyone may safely go with a foreigner, who cannot speak English, to a counsellor and inform him of his case (p).

The gift to be justified must be out of charity or compassion, but it is not necessary to shew that due inquiry was made or that a reasonable belief existed, that the action maintained was well founded (q). Charitable aid is none the less within the exception when coupled with interest arising from community of religion in a dispute relating to religious matters (r).

6. Lawyer and Client.—It is not maintenance for a lawyer to give professional aid to his client in legal proceedings.

A barrister may lawfully set forth his client's cause to the best advantage; but can no more justify giving him money to maintain his suit, or threatening a juror (s), than any other person. And a solicitor, when retained, may lawfully prosecute or defend an action, and lay out his own money in the suit (t).

Where there was one attorney on the record, and another attorney became before the trial really and substantially the attorney for the client in the conduct of the suit, and the latter, after verdict, but before judgment, bona fide purchased from his client the benefit of his verdict, it was held that the transaction, being a purchase of the subject-matter of the suit by the attorney, was void; for the attorney was to be considered as the attorney having the management of the cause, and the purchase was in effect a purchase by the attorney in the cause of the subject-matter of it pendente lite, not for the purpose of enabling the client to carry on the suit, but because he wanted money ; and independently of the statutes restraining the purchase of property in suit, no attorney could be permitted to purchase anything in litigation, of which litigation he had the management (u).

A contract with a solicitor to give him a portion of the profits arising from the successful prosecution of a suit to establish a right to coal mines on being indemnified against the costs of the proceedings is champerty and maintenance (v).

A contract whereby a solicitor stipulates with a client to receive, in consideration of the advances requisite to conducting the proceedings to a successful issue, over and above his legal costs, a sum commensurate with his outlay and exertions and with the benefit resulting to the client, is unlawful. The contract would be directly in violation of the laws against maintenance, if the stipulation were that the plaintiff, as solicitor in the action, in consideration of his advancing the funds necessary for carrying on the litigation, should receive a portion of the proceeds or property to be recovered ; and the only difference between the two cases is that, in the former, the party would have the security of the property ; whereas here he has only the personal security of the client. But if he be a solvent man, he get a share of the property by another mode, viz., by suing him, and obtaining judgment (w). An agreement to be carried into effect in this country, which would be void on the ground of champerty if made here, is not the less void because it is made in a foreign country, where such a contract would be legal. Where, therefore, an attorney entered into an agreement in France with a French subject to sue for a debt due to the latter from a person residing here, whereby the attorney was to receive by way of recompense a moiety of the amount recovered ; it was held that this agreement was void for champerty (x). If any act were done under such an agreement in England, the party doing it would be indictable here (y).

But there is a distinction between the assignment by a client to his solicitor of the subject-matter of a suit by way of security, and an absolute sale of the subject-matter of the suit. In the latter case the solicitor might have an opportunity of imposing on his client, from his superior knowledge of the value of that subject-matter, and might after the purchase take improper means to increase the value. But a mere assignment, by way of security, is open to no such danger, and may be very advantageous to the client (z). A client having obtained a verdict for recovery of certain land, by deed granted the crop of potatoes then growing upon the land, and all other effects thereon, until payment of £100 due with interest to the attorney (for money lent and professional services), with a proviso that if the client paid the £100 and the interest on a certain day, the deed should be void. The deed also contained a power to the attorney, on default of payment, to enter, carry away, and dispose of the effects assigned ; provided that, if he sold the property, he should hold the surplus, after paying the expenses and reimbursing himself, in trust for his client. It was held that this deed could not be impeached on the ground of either champerty or maintenance (a).

But no barrister or solicitor can justify using deceitful practices in maintenance of a client's cause : and they are liable to be punished for misdemeanors in this respect by the common law, and also by 3 Edw. I. Stat. Westm. 1, c. 29. All fraud and falsehood, tending to impose upon or abuse the justice of the King's courts, are within the purview of the statute (b).

It would seem that absence of mens rea or honesty of motive is not a defence to an indictment for maintenance (c).

Punishment.—By the common law as reinforced by the statutes set out below, all unlawful maintainers are not only liable to render damages in an action at the suit of the party grieved, but may also be indicted and fined, and (or) imprisoned ; and it seems that a Court of record may commit a man for an act of maintenance in the face of the Court (d).

By a statute of 1377 (1 Rich. II., c. 4), 'it is ordained and established and the King our Lord straightly commandeth that none of his counsellors, officers, or servants nor any other person within the realm of England, of whatsoever estate or condition they be shall from henceforth take nor sustain any quarrel by maintenance, in the country or elsewhere, on grievous pain ; that is to say, the counsellors and the King's great officers, on a pain which shall be ordained by the King himself, by the advice of the lords of his realm ; and other less officers and servants of the King, as well in the Exchequer and all the other Courts and places as of his own meiny, upon pain to lose their offices and services and to be imprisoned and then to be ransomed at the King's will, every of them according to his degree, estate and desert : and all other persons through the realm upon pain of imprisonment, and to be ransomed as the other aforesaid' (e).

SECT. IV.—CHAMPERTY (f).

Champerty is a species of maintenance, being a bargain with a plaintiff or defendant campum partiri, to divide the land or other matter sued for between them, if they prevail at law ; whereupon the champertor is to carry on the party's suit at his own expense (g). It is defined in the old books to be, the unlawful maintenance of a suit, in consideration of some bargain to have part of the thing in dispute, or some profit out of it (h).

The Ordinacio de Conspiratoribus (1300, 33 Edw. I.) declares that 'champertors be they that move pleas or suits or cause to be moved either by their own procurement or by others and sue them at their proper costs for to have part of the land in variance or part of the gains' (i).

The statute of Westminster 1 (1275, 3 Edw. I.), c. 25, enacts, that 'no officers of the King, by themselves nor by others, shall maintain pleas, suits, or matters, hanging in the King's courts, for lands, tenements, or other things, for to have part or profit thereof, by covenant made between them; and he that doth shall be punished at the King's pleasure' (j). In this statute 'courts' means courts of record only, and 'covenant' includes all kinds of promises and contracts of this kind. Maintenance in personal actions, to have part of the debt or damages, is as much within the statute as maintenance in real actions for a part of the land. The statute applies to a grant of rent out of the lands in question, but not to a grant of rent out of other lands; nor to a grant of part of a thing in suit, made in consideration of a precedent debt (k). The maintenance of a tenant or defendant is as much within the meaning of the statute as the maintenance of a demandant or plaintiff. And it has been held immaterial whether he who brings a writ of champerty did in truth suffer any damage by it, or whether the plea wherein it is alleged be determined or not (l).

By 13 Edw. I (Stat. Westm. the second), c. 49 (m), it is enacted that 'the chancellor, treasurer, justices, nor any of the King's council, no clerk of the chancery, nor of the exchequer, nor of any justice or other officer, nor any of the King's house, clerk ne lay, shall not receive any church, nor advowson of a church, land, nor tenement, in fee, by gift, nor by purchase, nor to farm, nor by champerty, nor otherwise, so long as the thing is in plea before us, or before any of our officers; nor shall take no reward thereof. And he that doth any such thing (ki ceste chose face), either himself or by another, or make any bargain (baret y face) shall be punished at the King's pleasure, as well he that purchaseth as he that doth sell.' This statute extends only to the officers therein named, and not to any other person (n). But it so strictly restrains all such officers from purchasing any land, pending a plea, that they cannot be excused by a consideration of kindred or affinity, and they are within the meaning of the statute by barely making such a purchase, whether they maintain the party in his suit or not; whereas such a purchase for good consideration made by any other person, of any terre-tenant, is no offence, unless it appear that he did it to maintain the party (o).

28 Edw. I. c. 11 (p), reciting that ‘ the King hath heretofore ordained by statute that none of his ministers should take no plea for champerty (a champart), by which statute others than officers (autres que ministres) were not bounden before this time,’ enacts that ‘ the King will that no officer, nor any other, for to have part of the thing in plea, shall not take upon him the business that is in suit ; nor none upon any such covenant shall give up his right to another ; and if any do, and he be attainted thereof, the taker shall forfeit unto the King so much of his lands and goods as doth amount to the value of the part that he hath purchased for such taking upon him (enprise). And to attain him thereof (pur ceo attendre), whosoever will shall be received to sue for the King before the justices before whom the plea hangeth, and the judgment shall be given by them. But it may not be understood hereby, that any person shall be prohibit to have counsel of pleaders, or of learned men in the law for his fee, or of his parents and next friends.’

It seems to be agreed that champerty in any action at law, and purchase of land, pending a suit in equity concerning it, are within this statute; and a lease for life or years, or a voluntary gift of land, pending a plea, is as much within the statute as a purchase for money. But neither a conveyance executed, pending a plea, in pursuance of a precedent bargain, nor a surrender by a lessee to his lessor, nor a conveyance or promise thereof made by a father to his son, or by an ancestor to his heir-apparent, nor a gift of land in suit, after the end of it, to a counsellor, for his fee or wages, without any kind of precedent bargain relating to such gift, are within the meaning of the statute (g). A bargain by a man, who has evidence in his own possession respecting a matter in dispute between third persons, and who at the time professes to have the means of procuring more evidence, to purchase from one of the contending parties, as the price of the evidence which he so possesses or can procure, an eighth part or share of the sum of money, which shall be recovered by means of the production of that evidence, is an illegal agreement ; and if there be any difference between such a contract, and direct champerty, it is strongly against the legality of such contract ; as besides the ordinary objection, that a stranger to the controversy has acquired an interest to carry on the litigation to the utmost extent, by every influence and means in his power, the bargain to furnish and to procure evidence for the consideration of a money payment in proportion to the effect produced by such evidence, has a direct tendency to pervert the course of justice (r). But a contract to communicate information on terms of getting a share of any property that might be recovered by means of this information is not champerty (s), unless it provides that the person giving the information and to share the property is himself to recover the property (t). Where a bill was filed for the purpose, amongst other things, of declaring an agreement void, which had been made by a seaman for the sale of his chance of prize money to his prize agents, who were to carry on the suit, Grant, M.R., expressed an opinion that the agreement was void, as amounting to champerty (u). An agreement with a man of straw to support a suit by him for penalties on terms of sharing the penalties recovered is champerty (v).

Subscription by strangers of money to maintain litigation for the recovery of property to be repaid out of the property if recovered is both maintenance and champerty (w).

In Sprye v. Porter (x), to a declaration upon an agreement the defendant pleaded that one T. died possessed of personal property, intestate and without any known relation, and that administration had been granted to the Treasury Solicitor, and that the defendant was ignorant of his being related to T., or in any way entitled to the property; and that it was thereupon unlawfully agreed between the parties that the plaintiff and R. should give and supply information and evidence in case of proceedings for recovery of the property, that, by means of such information and evidence, the defendant should successfully recover the property; and that if by means of such information and evidence the defendant should actually recover the property, he would pay each of them one-fifth of the amount; and that for the purpose of carrying this illegal agreement into effect the parties entered into the agreement set out in the declaration, and that it was under the illegal agreement that the property was actually recovered. It was held that this was maintenance in its worst aspect (y).

While the mere assignment of the subject of a suit is not maintenance, it is maintenance to agree to give another the benefit of a suit on condition that he prosecutes it (z).

Relationship or collateral interest will not justify or excuse champerty (a).

SECT. V.—BUYING AND SELLING PRETENDED TITLES.

Buying or selling a pretended title is said in the books to be a high offence at common law, as plainly tending to oppression, for a man to buy or sell at an under rate a doubtful title to lands known to be disputed, to the intent that the buyer may carry on the suit, which the seller does not think it worth his while to do. And it seems not to be material whether the title be good or bad; or whether the seller were in possession or not, unless the possession were lawful and uncontested (b). Offences of this kind were restrained by several statutes. By 13 Edw. I. c. 49 (c) no person of the King's house shall buy any title whilst the thing is in dispute, on pain of both the buyer and seller being punished at the King's pleasure. The similar but more general provisions of 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9, s. 2 (d), were repealed by sect. 11 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65).

SECT. VI.—EMBRACERY.

Embracery consists in such practices as tend to affect the administration of justice by improperly working upon the minds of jurors. It is immaterial whether the jurors are grand jurors or petty jurors (e). Any attempt whatsoever to corrupt or influence or instruct a jury in the cause beforehand, or in any way to incline them to be more favourable to the one side than to the other, by money, promises, letters, threats, or persuasions, except only by the strength of the evidence and the arguments of counsel in open court, at the trial, is an act of embracery, whether the jurors on whom such an attempt is made give verdict or not, or whether the verdict given be true or false (f). And giving money to another, to be distributed among jurors, is an offence of the nature of embracery, whether the money is or is not actually distributed. It is as criminal in a juror as in any other person to endeavour to prevail with his companions to give a verdict for one side by any means except by arguments from the evidence which may have been produced, and exhortations from the general obligations of conscience to give a true verdict. And all fraudulent contrivances whatsoever to secure a verdict are offences of this nature; as where persons by indirect means procure themselves or others to be sworn on a tales de circumstantibus in order to serve on one side (g).

It is said that the law will not suffer a mere stranger so much as to labour a juror to appear, and act according to his conscience: but it seems that a person who may justify any other act of maintenance (h) may safely labour a juror to appear and give a verdict according to his conscience; but that no other person can justify intermeddling so far. And no one can justify the labouring a juror not to appear (i).

Offences of this kind are indictable misdemeanors punished by fine and imprisonment without hard labour (j). They have also been dealt with by statute. 5 Edw. III. c. 10 enacted that any juror taking of the one party or the other, and being duly attainted, should not be put in any assizes, juries, or inquests, and shall be commanded to prison, and further ransomed at the King's will.

34 Edw. III. c. 8 (1360) enacted that a juror attainted of such offence should be imprisoned for a year.

The Juries Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 50), s. 61, repeals so much of 5 Edw. III. c. 10, 'as relates to the punishment of a corrupt juror,' and so much of 34 Edw. III. c. 8 (k), 'as directs the proceedings against jurors taking a reward to give their verdict'; and enacts and declares, by sect. 61, that 'notwithstanding anything herein contained, every person who shall be guilty of the offence of embracery, and every juror who shall wilfully or corruptly consent thereto, shall and may be respectively proceeded against by indictment or information, and be punished by fine and imprisonment, in like manner as every such person might have been before the passing of this Act.'

32 Hen. VIII. c. 9, s. 3, enacts that no person shall 'embrace any freeholders or jurors' . . . 'for to maintain any matter or cause, or to the disturbance or hindrance of justice or to the procurement or occasion of any manner of perjury by false verdict or otherwise' . . . 'upon pain of forfeiture for every such offence of £10,' half to the King and half to him that shall sue within a year (l).

(k) These Acts were repealed as to Ireland in 1833 (3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 93, s. 50). The Juries (Ireland) Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 65), s. 49, is substantially on the same lines as s. 62, supra.

CANADIAN NOTES.

OF BARRATRY, MAINTENANCE, CHAMPERTY, ETC.

Sec. 4.—Champerty is a criminal offence, and a champertous contract will not be enforced by the Courts. The English champerty laws were introduced or continued in Ontario and Quebec under the Quebec Act, 1774. Meloche v. Dequire, 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 89; Hopkins v. Smith (1901), 1 O.L.R. 659.

The criminal law of England on this subject was introduced into British Columbia by R.S.C. (1886) ch. 144, sec. 2.

A bargain by which A., a stranger to B., having no interest recognized by law in a given property, agrees to help B. to recover such property in a Court of justice in consideration of getting a portion of the fruits of the suit is champerty and is an indictable offence by the common law of England. Briggs v. Fleutot, 10 B.C.R., at p. 316.

BOOK THE EIGHTH.

OF OFFENCES WITH RESPECT TO PUBLIC OFFICE: AND OF BRIBERY AND CORRUPTION OF AND BY OFFICIALS, AGENTS, PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATES AND ELECTORS.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF MISCONDUCT IN OFFICE.

SECT. I.—GENERAL COMMON LAW RULE.

WHERE a public officer is guilty of misbehaviour in office by neglecting a duty imposed upon him either at common law or by statute, he commits a misdemeanor and is liable to indictment unless another remedy is substituted by statute (a). The liability exists whether he is a common law or a statutory officer (b); and a person holding an office of important trust and of consequence to the public, under letters patent or derivatively from such authority, is liable to indictment for not faithfully discharging the office (c). Where a duty is thrown on a body consisting of several persons, each is individually liable for a breach of duty, as well for acts of commission as for omission; and where a public officer is charged with a breach of duty, which duty arises from certain acts which he is bound to take notice of, it is not necessary to state that he had notice of those acts, for he is presumed from his situation to know them (d).

In some cases also the offence will involve a forfeiture of his office, if it be beneficial (e).

The present chapter will deal with oppression, negligence, fraud, and extortion by officers, and with refusal to take up an office on proper appointment. As to bribery and buying and selling offices, see post, pp. 619, 627.

SECT. II.—OPPRESSION.

Judicial Officers.—Although a judge is not indictable for mere error of judgment (f) the oppression and tyrannical partiality of judges and other magistrates in the administration, and under colour of their offices, may be punished by impeachment in Parliament, or by information or indictment, according to the rank of the offender and the circumstances of the offence (g).

High Court.—There are no modern instances of criminal proceedings against judges of the Supreme Court for misconduct in office (h). They cannot be removed from office except on address presented by both Houses of Parliament to the King (i).

Coroner.—‘A coroner’ [or deputy-coroner (j)] ‘who is guilty of extortion or of corruption or of wilful neglect of his duty or of misbehaviour in the discharge of his duty shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in addition to any other punishment may, unless his office of coroner is annexed to any other office, be adjudged by the Court before whom he is so convicted to be removed from his office’ (k). A coroner is also guilty of a misdemeanor if he acts as a solicitor to prosecute or defend a person for an offence of which he is charged on an inquisition taken before such coroner (l); or if he refuses on the written request of the majority of the jury to summon as a witness a qualified legal practitioner named by the jury, or to direct such person to make a post-mortem examination of the deceased (m). He is also liable to be summarily fined for not returning inquisitions, depositions, &c., in cases of murder and manslaughter, to the proper Court of trial, and for not attending (n) the Court in person (o).

It would seem to be misbehaviour within the Coroners Act, 1887, to refuse without adequate reason or from improper motives to hold an inquest (p), or to take an inquisition without view of the body (q), or to use corrupt influence over the jury (r), or to take sworn jurors off the panel so as to get from the remaining jurors a verdict of insanity (s). A criminal information has been allowed against a coroner who on a jury returning a verdict of accidental death recorded the verdict, but committed a person to prison on a charge of murder (t): and it appears to be misconduct for the coroner to enter the jury room when the jurors are deliberating and to take the verdict there (u). A coroner is liable to a motion by the Lord Chancellor for inability or misbehaviour in office (v).

County Court Judges.—County Court judges, like all other judges of inferior Courts, appear at common law to be liable to indictment for grave misconduct in office. A rule for a criminal information against a County Court judge for misconduct in office was discharged on the ground that the applicant had already elected his remedy by applying to the Lord Chancellor to inquire into the alleged misconduct (w).

Colonial Judges.—Judges of a Colonial Court directly appointed by the Crown are liable to amotion for misconduct (x).

Justices of the Peace.—Justices of the peace have often been held liable to criminal information for fraud or misconduct in office, which could not be excused by mistake or ignorance of law (y). As a general rule justices are not punishable for acts done at general or quarter sessions (z), but there are some precedents in respect of such acts (a). But with respect to the acts of justices in petty sessions or out of sessions the precedents are numerous (b).

Though a justice of the peace should act illegally, yet if he has acted honestly and candidly, without oppression, malice, revenge, or any bad view or ill-intention whatsoever, the Court will never punish him by the extraordinary course of a criminal information, but will leave the party complaining to his ordinary remedy by action or indictment (c). And whenever the acts or defaults of justices have been challenged, either by way of indictment, or application for a criminal information, the question has always been, not whether the act done might, upon full and mature investigation, be found strictly right, but from what motive it had proceeded; whether from a dishonest, oppressive, or corrupt motive (d), 'under which description fear and favour may generally be included,' or from mistake or error. In the former case alone they have become the objects of punishment (e).

Precedents of indictments are very rare, it being obviously more seemly and expedient that criminal proceedings against justices should be conducted in the High Court, and allowed only in the cases where the conditions imposed by the Crown Office Rules, 1906, rr. 35–39, are satisfied.

A large number of the precedents of criminal proceedings against justices relate to their conduct in the quasi-judicial functions as to granting or refusing licences to sell intoxicants. Though upon this subject the justices have a discretionary jurisdiction, and though discretion means the exercising the best of their judgment upon the occasion that calls for it, wilful abuse of such discretion is criminal (f). The High Court can therefore grant an information against justices who refuse, from corrupt and improper motives, to grant such licences (g); or for granting such licences improperly (h).

Where two sets of justices had concurrent jurisdiction, and one set appointed a meeting to grant ale licences, and, after such appointment, the other set appointed a meeting for the same purpose on a subsequent day, and having met, granted a licence which had been refused by the first set; it was held that the acts of the justices who appointed the second meeting were illegal and indictable. Kenyon, C.J., said that it was proper that the question should be settled whether it were legal for two different sets of magistrates, having concurrent jurisdiction, to run a race in the exercise of any part of their jurisdiction; and that it was of infinite importance to the public that the acts of magistrates should not only be substantially good, but also that they should be decorous. And Ashhurst, J., said that it was a breach of the law to attempt to wrest the jurisdiction out of the hands of the magistrates who first gave notice of the meeting; for what the law says shall not be done, it becomes illegal to do, and is therefore the subject-matter of an indictment, without the addition of any corrupt motives (i).

Jurors.—Misconduct by jurors sworn to try a civil or criminal cause is an offence usually punished summarily by fine for contempt of Court (j), but is apparently indictable if the misconduct is grave or involves actual corruption (k). Every juror who shall wilfully or corruptly consent to embracery (l) may be proceeded against by indictment or information, and is punishable by fine and imprisonment (m). It would seem that evidence of jurors is not admissible to prove misconduct by the jury or any juror in the jury room (n).

Executive and Ministerial Officers.—An indictment or criminal information will lie against executive or ministerial officers for oppression or for illegal acts done corruptly or from vindictive or otherwise improper motives, but not for acts done by ignorance or mistake (o).

Churchwardens.—By the Vestries Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 60), s. 11, 'if any churchwarden, rate-collector, overseer, or other parish officer, shall refuse to call meetings according to the provisions of this Act, or shall refuse or neglect to make and give the declarations and notices directed to be made and given by this Act, or to receive the vote of any ratepayer as aforesaid, or shall in any matter whatsoever alter, falsify, conceal, or suppress any vote or votes as aforesaid, such churchwarden, rate-collector, overseer, or other parish officer, shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor' (p).

The civil functions of churchwardens in rural parishes have been transferred to parish councils or to the chairman of the parish meeting, and they are no longer overseers of the poor (q). Their remaining functions are mainly, if not solely, ecclesiastical, and they would seem no longer to be public officers in the full sense of the term.

Clergymen.—It would seem that it is not an indictable offence for a clergyman to refuse to marry a couple (r). There is specific statutory provision for punishing breaches by clergymen of the Marriage Acts (s).

Constables.—An indictment lies at common law against a constable for neglecting the duties required of him by common law or by statute (t); and when a statute requires him to do what without requiring had been his duty, it is not imposing a new duty, and he is indictable at common law for the neglect (u).

Gaolers.—14 Edw. III. c. 10 (v), enacted that if any gaoler, by too great duress of imprisonment, makes any prisoner that he hath in ward become an approver against his will; that is, to accuse and turn evidence against some other person; it shall be felony in the gaoler. For it is not lawful to induce or excite any man even to a just accusation of another; much less to do it by duress of imprisonment; and least of all by a gaoler to whom the prisoner is committed for safe custody (w). And a gaoler may be discharged and fined for voluntarily suffering his prisoner to escape, or for barbarously misusing him (x). So, a gaoler is indictable for refusing to receive a prisoner duly committed by a magistrate (y).

Poor Law Officers. A. Misfeasance.—Overseers and other officers of the poor law are usually punished summarily for offences with regard to their duties (z). But an overseer of the poor is indictable for misfeasance in the execution of his office (a) ; if he misuse the poor, as by keeping and lodging several poor persons in a filthy, unwholesome room, with the windows not in a sufficient state of repair to protect them against the inclemency of the weather (b) or by exacting labour from them when they are unable to work (c). Overseers have been held indictable for neglecting to provide necessaries for the poor (d), including medical assistance (e). A relieving officer has been held to be indictable for refusing medical assistance to a poor person (f). If overseers procure, or contrive by sinister means to prevail upon, a man to marry a pregnant woman, for the purpose of throwing the expense of maintaining her and the issue from themselves upon another parish or township, they may be indicted (g). And for most breaches of their duty overseers may be punished by indictment or information (h) : but with respect to the proceeding by information, as it is an extraordinary remedy, the Court of King's Bench will not suffer it to be applied to the punishment of ordinary offences (i).

Strong intimations were thrown out that a refusal to marry is merely an ecclesiastical offence. See the Deceased Wife's Sister's Marriage Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. c. 47), s. 1.

IV. c. 64) the Court of Aldermen of the City of London had authority to exclude from Newgate gaol prisoners committed by the Middlesex justices.

An indictment against overseers on sect. 47 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834 (4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 76), for not accounting to the auditor of a union, upon request, on a day appointed by him, is bad, unless it appear that there was some rule, order, or regulation of the Local Government Board that the overseers should account upon such request ; and where no such order, &c., is alleged, the indictment cannot be sustained after verdict, merely because it appears, by inference, or by the inducement, that the defendants have not in fact accounted for one whole quarter (j).

An overseer of the poor is not indictable if (without force, fraud or menace) he removes a pauper under an order of removal after it has been confirmed on appeal by the sessions, subject to the opinion of the High Court, and before its final determination by that Court. The Court said that the action of the overseers was not a violation of any known rule or law (k).

As to wilful neglect by an overseer of his duties under the Registration Acts, see R. v. Hall [1891], 1 Q.B. 747, ante, p. 11.

B. Negligence.—An overseer of the poor is indictable for wilful neglect of duty. Thus overseers have been held indictable for not providing for the poor (l) ; for refusing to account within four days after the appointment of new overseers, under the Poor Law Act, 1601 (43 Eliz. c. 2) (m); for not making a rate to reimburse constables under the Poor Relief Act, 1662 (14 Car. II. c. 12) (n); and for not receiving a pauper sent to them by order of two justices (o); or disobeying any other order of justices, where the justices have competent jurisdiction (p). There may be cases in which the neglect to provide a pauper with necessaries is indictable. Thus where an indictment stated that the defendant, an overseer, had under his care a poor person belonging to his township, but neglected and refused to provide for her necessary meat, &c., whereby she was reduced to a state of extreme weakness, and afterwards, through want of such reasonable and necessary meat, &c., died, the defendant was convicted and sentenced to a year's imprisonment (q). And where an overseer was indicted for neglecting to supply medical assistance when required to a pauper labouring under dangerous illness, it was held that an offence was sufficiently charged and proved, though such pauper was not in the parish workhouse, nor had previously to his illness received or stood in need of parish relief (r).

(c) Grants a warrant for the execution of any writ before he has actually received that writ ; or

(d) Is guilty of any offence against or breach of the provisions of this Act, or of any wrongful act or neglect or default in the execution of his office, or of any contempt of any superior court ;

He and any person procuring the commission of any such offence shall, without prejudice to any other punishment under the provisions of this Act, but subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable—

(i) To be punished by the Court as hereinafter mentioned, and

(ii) To forfeit two hundred pounds, and pay all damages suffered by any person aggrieved.

And such forfeiture and damage may be recovered by such person as a debt by an action in his Majesty's High Court of Justice.

(3) Any of the following courts, that is to say, his Majesty's High Court of Justice, any Court of Assize, Oyer and Terminer or gaol delivery, or any judge of any of the said Courts, also where the alleged offence has been committed in relation to any writ issued out of any other court of record than those above mentioned, the Court out of which such writ issued may, on complaint made of any such offence as aforesaid having been committed and on proof on oath given by the examination of witnesses or by affidavit or on interrogatories of the commission of the alleged offence, and after hearing anything which the alleged offender may urge in his defence (which evidence and hearing may be taken and had in a summary matter), punish the offender or cause proceedings to be taken for his punishment in like manner as a person guilty of contempt of the said Court may be punished.

(4) The Court may order the costs of or occasioned by any such complaint to be paid by either party to the other, and an order by the High Court of Justice in any such summary proceeding to pay any costs, damages, or penalty, shall be of the same effect as a judgment of the High Court, and may be enforced accordingly.

(5) Any of the said Courts being a superior Court of record may also proceed for and deal with such offence in like manner as for any contempt of such Court.

(6) If any person not being an under-sheriff, bailiff, or officer of a sheriff, assumes or pretends to act as such, or demands or takes any fee or reward under colour or pretext of such office, he shall be liable to be punished in manner provided by this section as if he were an under-sheriff guilty of a contempt of Court.

(7) Any proceeding in pursuance of this section against a sheriff, under-sheriff, or any other person to whom this section applies shall be taken within two years after the alleged offence was committed, and not subsequently, and if the proceeding is in a summary manner shall be taken before the end of the sittings of the Court held next after the offence was committed and not subsequently.

(8) Nothing in this section shall render a person liable to be punished twice in respect of the same offence, but if any proceeding is taken against a person under this section for any offence the Court or Judge may postpone or stay proceedings and direct any other available proceeding to be taken for punishing such offence.

A sheriff is indictable for refusing or neglecting to execute a criminal according to his sentence (s); but he is not bound to execute a criminal if he be not in his custody, and in such case, if it is intended by the Court which passed the sentence that the sheriff should do execution, there should be a special mandate to the party having the prisoner in custody to deliver him to the sheriff, and another to the sheriff to receive the prisoner and execute him (t).

Misconduct by Crown Officials outside Great Britain.

There is a series of statutes providing for the trial in England of officers of the Crown who have committed certain classes of offences in connection with their office outside Great Britain.

By an Act of 1698 (11 Will. III. c. 12) entitled 'an Act to punish Governors of Plantations in the Kingdom for crimes by them committed in the plantations,' it is enacted (u) that 'If any governor, lieutenant-governor, deputy governor, or commander-in-chief of any plantation or colony within his Majesty's dominions beyond the seas shall . . . be guilty of oppressing any of his Majesty's subjects beyond the seas within their respective Governments or commands or shall be guilty of any other crime or offence contrary to the laws of the realm or in force within their respective governments or commands, such oppressions, crimes and offences shall be inquired of, tried and determined in his Majesty's Court of King's Bench here in England, or before such commissioners and in such county of this realm as shall be assigned by his Majesty's commission and by good and lawful men of the same county and that such punishments shall be inflicted on such offenders as are usually inflicted for offences of like nature committed here in England.' The Act contains no machinery for bringing the offender home nor for collecting evidence in the colony and applies only to governors and commanders-in-chief.

By the Criminal Jurisdiction Act, 1802 (42 Geo. III. c. 85), after reciting the Act of 1698 and Acts of 1773 and 1784 relating to India (v), it is enacted (sect. 1) that 'if any person who now (June 22, 1802) is or heretofore has been or shall hereafter be employed by or in the service of his Majesty his heirs or successors in any civil or military station, office, or capacity out of Great Britain, or shall heretofore have had, held or exercised or now has, holds, or exercises, or shall hereafter have, hold, or exercise any public station, office, capacity, or employment, out of Great Britain, shall have committed, or shall commit, or shall have heretofore been, or is, or shall hereafter be, guilty of any crime, misdemeanor, or offence in the execution, or under colour, or in the exercise of any such station office capacity or employment as aforesaid, every such crime offence or misdemeanor may be prosecuted or inquired of, and heard and determined

(s) See Sheriffs Act, 1887, s. 13.

(t) R. v. Antrobus, 2 A. & E. 788, 803, Denman, C.J.

(u) The preamble recites that due punishment was not provided for several crimes committed out of the realm of England, and that divers governors, &c., had taken advantage thereof, and had not been deterred from oppressing his Majesty's subjects within their several governments, nor from committing several other great crimes and offences, not deeming themselves punishable for the same here nor accountable therefor to any person within their respective governments.

in his Majesty's Court of King's Bench here in England, either upon an information exhibited by his Majesty's Attorney-General, or upon an indictment found, on which information or indictment such crime, offence or misdemeanor, may be laid and charged to have been committed in the county of Middlesex, and all such persons so offending, and also all persons tried under any of the provisions of the said recited Act [of 1698, supra] or this Act, or either of them, for any offence crime or misdemeanor, and not having been before tried for the same out of Great Britain, shall on conviction be liable to such punishment as may by any law or laws now in force, or any Act or Acts that may hereafter be passed, be inflicted for any such crime, misdemeanor, or offence committed in England and shall also be liable, at the discretion of his Majesty's Court of King's Bench, to be adjudged incapable of serving his Majesty in any station, office, or capacity, civil or military, or of holding or exercising any public employment whatever.'

Sects. 2, 3, 4 make provision for the issue of writs of mandamus to Courts or persons in the country where the offence was committed for the taking of evidence in support of the matters charged against the accused, and for the transmission to the Court of King's Bench of the depositions or answers to interrogatories. Sect. 5 makes provision for punishing wilful and corrupt false evidence as perjury under the law of the kingdom (w), island or place in which the evidence is taken.

This statute appears to apply to the whole of the King's dominion outside Great Britain. It has been held not to apply to felonies, but only to misdemeanors (x). It has been used to try colonial governors for alleged oppressions and illegalities (y), and to try officers for frauds on the Crown (z).

India.—There is also a series of statutes applying to official misconduct in India, all passed while that country was still in the hands of the East India Company, but still in force. The statutes are 10 Geo. III. c. 47, s. 4; 13 Geo. III. c. 63, s. 39; 21 Geo. III. c. 70, s. 7; 24 Geo. III. (sess. 2), c. 25, ss. 64–83 (a); 33 Geo. III. c. 52, ss. 62, 63–67, 140, 162; 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 85, s. 80 (b). The offences are made triable in the High Court of Justice in Middlesex within a time variously limited after the commission of the offence or the return of the official to England.

The East India Company Act, 1793 (33 Geo. III. c. 52), s. 62, enacts that 'the demanding or receiving any sum of money, or other valuable thing, as a gift or present, or under colour thereof, whether it be for the use of the party receiving the same, or for or pretended to be for the use of the said [East India] Company, or of any other person whatsoever, by any British subject holding or exercising any office or employment under his Majesty, or the said united Company in the East Indies, shall be deemed to be extortion and a misdemeanor at law, and punished as such. . . .' The offender is also to forfeit to the King the present so received, or its full value; but the Court may order such present to be restored to the party who gave it, or may order it, or any part of it, or of any fine which they shall set upon the offender, to be paid to the prosecutor or informer (sect. 63).

An ex-officio information charged that the defendant, a British subject, held for a long time the office of resident at Tanjore, and during all that time resided in the East Indies, and that whilst he held the said office, and within six years before the filing of the information, in the East Indies, he did unlawfully receive from a certain person in the East Indies a sum of 2,000 rupees, as a gift and present, against the statute; whereby he was guilty of extortion and a misdemeanor, and by force of the statute had forfeited the sum of £200, the value of the said rupees; and the Court of Queen's Bench held that it was no ground to arrest the judgment that the count did not state whether the rupees were Bombay, Madras, or Sicca rupees, or state the value of a single rupee; and that Court and the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the count was good, although it did not aver that the gift was received by way of extortion or under colour of the office: first, because, supposing the statute were confined to such cases, the information was made good after verdict by the sect. 21 of the Criminal Law Act, 1826 (7 Geo. IV. c. 64), as it described the offence in the words of the statute creating it; and secondly, because the Act of 1793 extended to any receipt of a gift by any officer; for the object of the Legislature was to prevent any officer from receiving any gift or present of money in the East Indies absolutely, whatever the reason of the gift might be; and, although the count did not allege for whose use or pretended use the gift was received; for even if an officer received a present under colour of its being a present to the Queen, he would be guilty of an offence within the statute (c).

Indictment.—Upon an indictment against an officer for neglect of duty, it is sufficient to state that he was such officer, and it is not necessary to state his appointment (d). The indictment need not aver that the

(c) R. v. Douglas, 13 Q.B. 42. The jury had found a verdict on several counts, charging receipts of sums in rupees as gifts, after which followed a finding as to each count severally that the sum received, as in the count mentioned, was the sum of so many rupees, which sum of rupees, at the time of receiving them, was of the value of so much British money, being at the rate of 1s. 11d. per rupee, and the Court of Queen's Bench adjudged fine and imprisonment separately upon each count upon which the defendant was convicted; and further, that the defendant, in pursuance of the statute, do also forfeit to the Queen the several sums following (naming the value of the sums in rupees, as found on each count respectively), the said forfeitures amounting together to the sum of (the aggregate of the values); and further, that the defendant be imprisoned until he shall have paid the said fines and forfeitures. And the Court of Exchequer Chamber held, 1st, that this judgment was good, although it did not give the defendant the option of forfeiting the gifts actually received, as the gift itself was money; 2ndly, that it was right to estimate the value at the time of the receipt, and not of the conviction; 3rdly, that imprisonment in default of paying the forfeiture was rightly awarded, as that forfeiture was not arbitrarily imposed by the Court, but fixed by the statute, and superadded, by authority of the statute, to the other punishments of the offence. The Court of Queen's Bench held that the alterations in the Madras Courts made by several statutes did not preclude the issuing of a mandamus under the East India Company Act, 1773 (13 Geo. III. c. 63, s. 40), to examine witnesses, to the Madras Court as finally constituted, and that such a mandamus directed to the Chief Justice and other judges, who were two, of the Madras Supreme Court, requiring them to hold a Court and examine witnesses, was well executed by the Chief Justice and one other judge. See also this case as to what parchment writings are such examinations as are required by the Act to be returned to such a mandamus.

defendant had notice of all the facts it states, if it was his duty to have known them (e). Where some of the charges against the defendant were for disobeying orders, and it was stated that those orders were made and communicated to him, but their continuance in force was not averred, it was ruled that the orders must be taken to continue in force until revoked (f).

SECT. III.—FRAUD.

General.—A public officer may be indicted for frauds committed in his official capacity. Thus where two persons were indicted for enabling others to pass their accounts with the pay office in such a way as to enable them to defraud the Government, though it was objected that it was only a private matter of account and not indictable, the Court held otherwise, as it related to the public revenue (g). And an indictment or criminal information will lie for failing to account for money received virtute officii (h); for defrauding the Crown in the purchase of stores by means of false vouchers (i) and generally for frauds in office (j), whether the officer is employed in England or in a British possession (k), or even in a foreign country (l). As to offences outside the realm and in India, vide ante, pp. 609, 610.

Justices' Clerks.—A justices' clerk has been held to be indictable for refusing to pay over to the county treasurer half of the penalty imposed by justices under sect. 26 (now repealed) of the Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 61) (m).

Overseers.—An overseer of the poor who had received from the putative father of a bastard child born within the parish a sum of money as a composition with the parish for the maintenance of the child, was held liable to indictment for fraudulently omitting to give credit for this sum in his accounts with the parish (n). It was objected that the defendant was not bound to bring this sum to account, the contract being illegal (o); that the whole might have been recovered back, and that the defendant himself would have been personally answerable for it to the putative father; that the money, therefore, was not the money of the parish, and that the parish was neither defrauded nor damnified by its being omitted in the overseer's accounts. But Lord Ellenborough was of opinion, that though the defendant would have been liable to the putative father for so much of the money as was not expended upon the maintenance of the child and the lying-in of the mother, yet having was an indictment under the East India Company Act, 1784 (24 Geo. III. c. 25). The statute made wilful neglect of duty a misdemeanor; and it was held that the indictment need not aver corruption. Ss. 1-63 of the Act were repealed in 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 63).

taken the money as overseer for the benefit of the parish, he was bound to bring it to account, and that he was guilty of an indictable offence by attempting to put it into his own pocket.

Wilful disobedience by overseers, assistant overseers, and officers of a parish or union to the legal and reasonable orders of justices and guardians in carrying to execution the Poor Law Acts or orders is summarily punishable by statute (p).

Wilful neglect of the rules, regulations or orders of the Local Government Board under the Poor Law Acts is also punishable by statute, and on the third offence as a misdemeanor or indictment by fine of not less than £20 and imprisonment (q).

Registrars.—By the Yorkshire Registries Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 54), s. 46, 'If any registrar or other person employed in the register office is party or privy to any act of fraud or collusion in relation to the registration of any assurance, will, or other instrument under this Act, or the giving of any certificate or copy, or the making of any search or the taking of any extract or copy under this Act, or any rules made thereunder, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall upon conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment with or without hard labour for any period not exceeding two years.

SECT. IV.—EXTORTION.¹

Extortion in a large sense signifies any oppression under colour of right: but in a more strict sense signifies the unlawful taking by any officer, by colour of his office, of any money or thing of value that is not due to him, or more than is due, or before it is due (r).

The offence of extortion is a misdemeanor at common law punishable by fine and imprisonment: and also by removal from the office in the execution whereof it was committed (s). It was regarded of special gravity when officers of the law took money for their judgments or for the release of prisoners in their custody (t).

By 3 Edw. I. (Stat. West. prim.), c. 26 (1275), it is enacted that 'no sheriff nor other the King's officer take any reward to do his office, but shall be paid of that which they take by the King; and he that so doth shall

AMERICAN NOTE.

¹ As to extortion in America, see Williams v. Sneed, 160; S. v. Brown, 12 Minn. 490; P. v. Rust, 1 Caines, 130; C. v. Bayley, 7 Pick. 279. There are many statutes in America which deal with this offence. Bishop Amer. Cr. L. ii. s. 404.

It seems that in America a person who is not an officer, but who serves as such and claims to be such, is estopped from denying his official appointment. Bishop, ii. s. 392, citing 1 Gab. Crim. Law, 783; S. v. McIntyre, 3 Irel. 171, 174; S. v. Sellers, 7 Rich. 368, 372; P. v. Cook, 4 Seld. 67, 59 Am. Dec. 451. This is said to follow from the maxim 'omnia presumuntur rite esse acta' where a man is doing a lawful thing, and it is presumed to be done lawfully; but if a man does an unlawful act it cannot be presumed that he does it lawfully. Some offences are in America called 'extortion' where the defendant cannot be called an officer at all, see Bishop, ii. s. 392.

yield twice as much and shall be punished at the King's pleasure' (u). An action lies to recover the double value (v). This enactment is repealed as to sheriffs and their officers by the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), and replaced by sect. 29 (2) of that Act, ante, p. 607, and is superseded as to coroners by sect. 8 (2) of the Coroners Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 71). As to extortion by Indian officials, see 33 Geo. III. c. 52, s. 62, ante, p. 610.

Where a collector of post-horse duty demanded a sum of money of a person, charging with having let out post-horses without paying the duty, and threatened him with an Exchequer process, and he thereon gave him a promissory note for five pounds, which was afterwards paid and the proceeds handed over to the farmer of the post-horse duties, it was held to be extortion (w).

Official Fees.—Justices of the peace are bound by the old form of their oath of office (x) to take nothing for the execution of their office but of the King, and fees accustomed, and costs limited by statute. And no public officer may take any other fees or rewards for doing anything relating to his office than some statute in force gives him, or such as have been anciently and accustomably taken; and if he does otherwise, he is guilty of extortion (y). All prescriptions contrary to the statute and to the common law have always been held void; as where the clerk of a market claimed certain fees as due time out of mind for the examination of weights and measures (z).

The stated and known fees allowed by courts of justice to their respective officers are not restrained by the common law, or by 3 Edw. I. c. 26, supra, and at common law may be legally demanded and insisted upon without extortion (a). An officer who takes a reward, voluntarily given to him, and usual in certain cases, for the more diligent or expeditious performance of his duty, cannot be said to be guilty of extortion; for without such a premium it would be impossible in many cases to have the laws executed with vigour and success (b). But it has been always held, that a promise to pay an officer money for the doing of a thing for which the law will not suffer him to take anything is merely void, however freely and voluntarily made (c).

The following statutes impose penalties for offences in the nature of extortion by taking excessive or illegal fees:—Officers of the High Court (15 & 16 Vict. c. 73, s. 26, common law; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, ss. 3, 4, chancery); bailiffs of inferior Courts (7 & 8 Vict. c. 19, s. 3), or of County Courts (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43, s. 50); clerks of Courts of Assize and Quarter Sessions for taking certain fees as to discharge of recognizances or for drawing indictments (10 Will. III. c. 12, ss. 7, 8), or on discharge of accused persons (53 Geo. III. c. 50, ss. 4, 5, 9; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 114, s. 1); and clerks of the peace for receiving excessive fees (57 Geo. III. c. 91, s. 2; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 30; 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, s. 164); and clerks of justices for taking excessive fees (26 Geo. II. c. 14, s. 2).

Coroners.—Extortion by a coroner or his deputy is a statutory misdemeanor (d). It is extortion for a coroner to accept a bribe under a threat to hold an unnecessary inquest (e), or to refuse to view a body until the fees of himself and his clerk have been paid (f).

Gaolers.—It is extortion for a gaoler to obtain money from his prisoner by colour of his office (g), or to detain the corpse of a prisoner in order to enforce a claim for his charges (h). And by the Gaol Fees Abolition Act, 1815 (55 Geo. III. c. 50), s. 13, it is a misdemeanor for a gaoler to exact fees from prisoners for or on account of their entrance, commitment, or discharge, or to detain a prisoner for non-payment of a fee or gratuity. Prison officers incur penalties for taking fees (28 & 29 Vict. c. 126, ss. 20, 66).

Churchwardens.—It has been held extortion in a churchwarden (i) to obtain a silver cup or any other valuable thing by colour of his office; and that he is indictable if he take money corruptly colore officii and does not account for it (j).

Ecclesiastical Officers.—It has been held to be extortion for the chancellor and registrar of a bishop to oblige the executor of a will to prove it in the Bishop's Court and to take fees thereon when they knew that the will had already been proved in the Prerogative Court (k).

Franchise Holders.—Where custom has ascertained the toll, if the mill takes more than the custom warrants, it is extortion (l); and the same if a ferryman takes more than his due by custom for the use of his ferry (m). And where the farmer of a market erected so many stalls, as not to leave sufficient room for the market people to stand and sell their wares, so that for want of room they were forced to hire the stalls of the farmer, taking money for the use of the stalls in such a case was held extortion (n).

By sect. 50 of the Turnpike Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 95), no person who shall take more toll than he is authorised to take, shall be prosecuted by indictment for extortion, or otherwise (o).

Sheriffs.—Extortion by sheriffs and their officers is punishable under 50 & 51 Vict. c. 55, s. 29, set out ante, p. 607. It is extortion for an under-sheriff to obtain his fees by refusing to execute process till they are paid (p) and for a sheriff's officer to bargain for money to be paid him by A. to accept A. and B. as bail for C. whom he has arrested (q), or to arrest a man in order to obtain a release from him (r).

(o) This is not repealed, but the unrepealed portion of the Act is now treated as local and personal (see 53 & 54 Vict. c. 51, s. 3. S. L. R.), and all turnpike trusts are now expired. In R. v. Hamlyn, 4 Camp. 379, it had been decided that questions of exemption from toll could not be tried by indicting the turnpike keeper for extortion in taking the toll.

Indictment.—Two persons may be indicted jointly for extortion where no fee was due. Upon an indictment against the chancellor and the registrar of a bishop, it was objected that the offices of the defendants were distinct, that what might be extortion in one might not be so in the other, and that therefore the indictment ought not to be joint. But Parker, C.J., said: 'This would be an exception if they were indicted for taking more than they ought; but it is only against them for contriving to get money where none is due: and this is an entire charge. For there are no accessories in extortion (s): but he that is assisting is as guilty as the extortioner, as he that is party to a riot is answerable for the acts of others' (t). And an indictment against three averring that they, colore officiorum suorum, took so much, is good, for they might take so much in gross, and afterwards divide it amongst them, of which the party grieved could have no notice (u).

An indictment for extortion is triable in the county where the offence was committed (v) and is within the jurisdiction of Courts of Quarter Sessions (w). A count for extortion ought to charge a single offence only; because every extortion from every particular person is a separate and distinct offence, and each offence requires a separate and distinct punishment, and therefore a count charging the defendant with extorting divers sums exceeding the ancient rate for ferrying men and cattle over a river was held bad (x). The indictment must state a sum which the defendant received: but it is not material to prove the exact sum as laid in the indictment; so that on an indictment for taking extortionately twenty shillings, proof of but one shilling will be sufficient (y). An indictment for extortion, where nothing was due, ought to state that nothing was due (z); and if it is for taking more than was due, it ought to shew how much was due (a). The offence lies in the taking, not in the extortionate agreement, and a pardon after the agreement and before the taking does not pardon the extortion (b).

SECT. V.—OF REFUSAL TO SERVE A PUBLIC OFFICE.

It is a misdemeanor at common law, punishable by fine and (or) imprisonment to refuse to serve a public office when duly elected (c). And the refusal of persons to execute ministerial offices to which they are duly appointed, and from the execution of which they have no proper ground of exemption (d), seems in general to be punishable by indictment. Indictments for this offence have not been presented for many years, and the existing precedents appear to apply only to parochial or corporate offices filled by election, except one, which relates to the refusal of a sheriff to take up his office or appointment (e).

The indictment must aver that the defendant had notice of his appointment to the office in question (f).

Constables.—It is indictable for a constable, after he has been duly chosen, to refuse to execute the office (g), or to refuse to take the oath for that purpose (h). But a person is not liable to serve the office of constable unless he is resident in the parish. Where, therefore, a person occupied a house, and paid all parish rates in respect of it, and carried on the trade of a printer, frequenting the house daily on all working days, and sometimes remaining there during the night at work, but not sleeping in the house, it was held that he was not liable to serve the office of constable in the parish where the house was situated (i). But where a person occupied a warehouse in M., and usually slept at a lodging-house in M. from Monday till Saturday, when he returned to his mother's in H., where he also had premises, and he did suit and service to the court-leet of H., the Court thought that he was liable to be appointed a constable of M. (j).

Mayors, &c.—In the case of mayors, aldermen and persons elected to serve in municipal office, refusal to serve is punishable by fine, which in practice, if not in law, supersedes the remedy by indictment (k).

(i) R. v. Adlard, 4 B. & C. 772; 7 D. & R. 340. See Donne v. Martyr, 8 B. & C. 62.

(j) R. v. Mosley, 3 A. & E. 488. See this case as to what is an excessive fine for refusing to serve the office. It is sufficient, in an indictment for refusing to execute the office of constable, to state that the defendant unlawfully, &c., 'did neglect and refuse to take upon himself the execution of the said office;' and it is not necessary to state that he refused to be sworn. R. v. Brain, 3 B. & Ad. 614. Upon such an indictment, proof that he refused to be sworn is sufficient prima facie evidence of a refusal to take the office; but if it were proved that, although not sworn, he had acted as constable, the refusal to take the oath would not prove that he refused to take the office. Ibid. Where there is a special custom of swearing in constables, as in the City of London, it is unnecessary to set such custom out in the indictment. Where, if an indictment for refusing to serve the office of constable on being thereto chosen by a corporation did not set forth the prescription of the corporation so to choose, it was bad; for a corporation has no power of common right to choose a constable. R. v. Barnard, 1 Ld. Raym. 94.

Overseers of the Poor.—A person is indictable for refusing to take upon himself the office of overseer of the poor (l). For though the Poor Law Act, 1601 (43 Eliz. c. 2), says only that certain persons therein described shall be overseers, and gives no express indictment for a refusal of the office, yet upon the principles of the common law, which are that every man shall be indicted for disobeying a statute, the refusal to serve when duly appointed is indictable (m). But there should be previous notice of the appointment, and the indictment should shew that the defendant was bound to undertake the office by setting forth how he was elected (n).

(n) R. v. Harpur, 5 Mod. 96. In R. v. Burder, 4 T. R. 778, it was held that an appointment of an overseer of the poor for the year next ensuing must be understood to be for the overseer's year : and an indictment, stating that the defendant was appointed 'overseer of the poor of the parish of A.' and that he afterwards refused 'to take the said office of overseer of the parish to which he was so appointed,' was held good on demurrer.

It was also contended, in the same case, that the deputy registrar could not be legally convicted so long as his principal legally held the office; but it was held that the deputy was liable to be indicted not only while the principal holds office, but even after the deputy himself has been dismissed from his office. *R. v. The magistrates had held that the charge was not sustained by the evidence, but had collected the costs above mentioned from the accused as a condition of his discharge.

The offence is not constituted by demand only without actual receipt of the illegal fee. Ibid; Parsons v. Crabb, 31 U.C.C.P. 151.

The statute of 1275, 3 Edw. I. ch. 26, which deals with both civil and criminal process therefor, is declaratory of the common law in enacting the offence of extortion by the King's officers to be indictable; the offence is a common law misdemeanour punishable on indictment or information by fine and imprisonment and removal from office. Ibid. The repeal of that statute as regards Ontario by Ont. Stat. 1902, 2 Edw. VII. ch. 1, is in terms as well as constitutionally limited to such portions of same as are within the provincial legislative authority. Stat. Law Revision Act (Ont.), 1902, ch. 1, sec. 2.

Evidence of corrupt motive must be adduced in order to obtain leave to exhibit a criminal information against a justice of the peace for malfeasance of office. The King v. Currie, 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 343.

Misbehaviour in office is an indictable offence at common law and it is not essential that pecuniary damage should have resulted to the public by reason of such irregular conduct, nor that the defendant should have acted from corrupt motives. R. v. John R. Arnoldi (1893), 23 O.R. 201. A man accepting an office of trust concerning the public, especially if attended with profit, is answerable criminally to the King for misbehaviour in his office. R. v. Bembridge, 22 St. Tr. 1, 3 Doug. 327. And where there is a breach of trust, fraud or imposition in a matter concerning the public, though as between individuals it would only be actionable, yet as between the King and the subject it is indictable. Ibid.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF BUYING AND SELLING PUBLIC OFFICES.

Common Law.—The buying and selling of offices of a public nature has been held a misdemeanor and indictable at common law (a). In R. v. Vaughan (b) Lord Mansfield said that a great officer of the Crown, at the head of the Treasury and in the King's confidence, would be guilty of a misdemeanor in selling his interest with the King on procuring an office (c) and 'wherever it is a crime to take it is a crime to give; they are reciprocal.' That case was an attempt, by offering a bribe to the Duke of Grafton, then first Lord of the Treasury and a Privy Councillor, to procure the grant to the defendant of a patent of the reversion to the office of clerk in the Supreme Court of Jamaica. On an indictment for conspiracy to obtain money, by procuring from the Lords of the Treasury the appointment of a person to an office in the customs (d), it was proposed to argue that the indictment was bad on the face of it, as it was not a misdemeanor at common law to sell or to purchase an office like that of coast-waiter. But Ellenborough, C.J., said that if that were to be made a question, it must be debated on a motion in arrest of judgment, or on a writ of error; but that, after reading R. v. Vaughan, it would be very difficult to argue that the offence charged in the indictment was not a misdemeanor. And Grose, J., afterwards, in passing sentence, said that there could be no doubt but that the offence charged was clearly a misdemeanor at common law.

Where the defendant, who was clerk to the agent for the French prisoners of war at Porchester Castle, took bribes in order to procure the exchange of some of them out of their turn, it appears to have been made the subject of an indictment (e).

Statutes.—The principal statutes against the sale of public office still in force (f) are hereunder stated.

(a) Stockwell v. North, Noy, 102; Moore (K.B.) 781. 1 Hawk. c. 67, s. 3. Bac. Abr. tit. 'Offices and Officers.' 3 Chit. Cr. L. 681.

(b) 4 Burr. 2494, 2500.

(c) He added: 'I suppose that most of the impeachments against ministers have been for taking money to procure offices grantable by the Crown.'

(d) R. v. Pollman, 2 Camp. 229n.

(e) R. v. Beale, cited in R. v. Gibbs, 1 East, 183.

(f) 12 Rich. II. c. 2 enacted, 'that the chancellor, treasurer, keeper of the privy seal, steward of the King's house, the King's chamberlain, clerk of the rolls, the justices of the one bench and of the other, barons of the Exchequer, and all other that shall be called to ordain, name, or make, justices of the peace, sheriffs, escheaters, customers, comptrollers, or any other officer or minister of the King, shall be firmly sworn that they shall not ordain, name, or make, any of the above-mentioned officers for any gift or brokerage, favour, or affection; nor that none which pursueth by himself, or by other, privily or openly, to be in any manner of office, shall be put into the same office, or in any other, but that they make all such officers and ministers of the best and most lawful men, and sufficient to their estimation and knowledge.' This Act was repealed in 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 48). As to its meaning, effect, and extent, see Earl of Macclesfield's case, 16 St. Tr. 767.

The Sale of Offices Act, 1551 (5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 16) (g), for the avoiding of corruption which may hereafter happen to be in the officers and ministers, in places or rooms wherein there is requisite to be had the true administration of justice or services of trust, and to the intent that persons worthy and meet to be advanced to the place where justice is to be ministered, &c., should hereafter be preferred to the same and none other, enacts (sect. 1) that if any person or persons at any time hereafter bargain or sell any office or offices, or deputation of any office or offices, or any part or parcel of any of them, or receive, have, or take any money, fee, reward, or any other profit directly or indirectly, or take any promise, agreement, covenant, bond, or any assurance to receive or have any money, fee, reward, or other profit, directly or indirectly, for any office or offices or for the deputation of any office or offices, or any part of any of them, or to the intent that any person should have, exercise, or enjoy any office or offices . . . which office or offices, or any part or parcel thereof, shall in anywise concern the administration or execution of justice, or the receipt, controlment, or payment of the King's . . . treasure, rent, revenue, account alneage, auditorship or surveying of any of the King's . . . honours, castles, manors, lands, tenements, woods or hereditaments, or any of the King's . . . customs (h) or any other administration, or necessary attendance to be had, done or executed in any of the King's Majesty's custom house or houses, or the keeping of any of the King's towns, castles, or fortresses being used, occupied, or appointed for a place of strength and defence, or which shall concern or touch any clerkship in any court of record wherein justice is to be ministered; the offender shall not only lose and forfeit all his right, interest and estate in or to such office or deputation of office, but also shall be adjudged a person disabled to have, occupy, or enjoy such office or deputation. The statute further enacts (sect. 2) that such bargains, sales, bonds, agreements, &c., shall be void; and provides (sect. 3) that the Act shall not extend to any office whereof any person shall be seised of any estate of inheritance, nor to any office of the keeping of any park, house, manor, garden, chase, or forest. It also provides (sect. 4) that all judgments given or things done by offenders, after the offence and before the offender shall be removed from the exercise of the office or deputation, shall be good and sufficient in law (i).

There are many decisions on this Act collected in Chit. Stat. vol. 8, tit. 'Offices (against sale of).'

The following offices have been held to fall within the purview of the Act: Chancellor, registrar, and commissary in ecclesiastical courts and surrogates (j); cofferer (k), surveyor of the customs (l); customer of a port (m); of collector and supervisor of the excise (n); clerk of the crown, and clerk of the peace (o); gaolers (p); and stewards of Courts leet (q). But offices in fee have been held to be out of the statute (r); nor was the sale of a bailiwick of a hundred within it, for such an office did not concern the administration of justice, nor is it an office of trust (s). And for the like reason the office of clerk to the deputy registrar in the prerogative Court of Canterbury was held to be not within the Act (t). A seat in the six clerks' office was not within the statute, being a ministerial office only (u); the statute did not extend to military officers (v). In Purdy v. Stacy (w), Lord Mansfield said that if the Lords of the Admiralty were to take money for their warrant to appoint a person to be a purser, it would be criminal in the corruptor and corrupted.

One who makes a contract for an office in violation of the Act is absolutely disabled for life from holding the office and his capacity cannot be restored by any grant or dispensation whatever (v).

Deputation.—Where an office is within the statute, and the salary is certain, if the principal makes a deputation reserving a less sum out of the salary, it is good. And if the profits are uncertain, and arise from fees, if the principal makes a deputation reserving a certain sum out of the fees and profits of the office, it is good: for in these cases the deputy is not to pay unless the profits arise to so much; and though a deputy by his constitution is in place of his principal, yet he has no right to his fees, they still continuing to be the principal's; so that, as to him, it is only reserving a part of his own, and giving away the rest to another. But where the reservation or agreement is not to pay out of the profits, but to pay generally a certain sum, it must be paid at all events; and a bond for performance of such agreement is void by the statute (y).

This Act is recited and much extended by the Sale of Offices Act, 1809 (49 Geo. III. c. 126), which enacts (sect. 1), that 'all the provisions therein contained shall extend to Scotland and Ireland, and to all offices in the gift of the Crown, or of any office appointed by the Crown, and all commissions, civil, naval, or military (z), and to all places and employments, and to all deputations to any such offices, commissions, places, or employments, in the respective departments or offices, or under the appointment or superintendence and control of the lord high treasurer, or commissioners of the Treasury, the secretary of state, the lords commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral (a). . . . touching or concerning the trust and duty of any office or employment under the Crown, or the East India Company, by any British subject there resident, is to be deemed a misdemeanor. This Act appears to be superseded by 49 Geo. III. c. 126, supra. See the Government of India Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 106).

or in anywise touching, concerning, or relating to, any nomination, appointment, or deputation to, or resignation of, any such office, commission, place, or employment, as aforesaid, or under any pretence for using or having used any interest, solicitation, petition, request, recommendation, or negotiation, in or about any such nomination, appointment, deputation, or resignation, or for the obtaining or having obtained the consent or consents, or voice or voices, of any person or persons, as aforesaid to such nomination, appointment, deputation, or resignation; and also if any person or persons shall give or pay, or cause or procure to be given or paid, any money, fee, gratuity, loan of money, reward, or profit, or make, or cause, or procure to be made, any promise, agreement, covenant, contract, bond, or assurance, or by any way, means, or device, contract or agree, or give or pay, or cause or procure to be given or paid, any money, fee, gratuity, loan of money, reward or profit, for any solicitation, petition, request, recommendation, or negotiation whatever, made or to be made, that shall in anywise touch, concern, or relate to any nomination, appointment, or deputation to, or resignation of, any such office, commission, place, or employment as aforesaid, or for the obtaining or having obtained, directly or indirectly, the consent or consents, or voice or voices, of any persons or person as aforesaid, to any such nomination, appointment, deputation, or resignation; and also if any person or persons shall, for or in expectation of gain, fee, gratuity, loan of money, reward, or profit, solicit, recommend, or negotiate in any manner, for any person or persons, in any matter that shall in anywise touch, concern, or relate to, any such nomination, appointment, deputation, or resignation aforesaid, or for the obtaining, directly or indirectly, the consent or consents, or voice or voices, of any person or persons to any such nomination, appointment, or deputation, or resignation aforesaid, then and in every such case every such person, and also every person who shall wilfully and knowingly aid, abet, or assist, such person therein, shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 5, ' . . . If any person or persons shall open or keep any house, room, office or place for the soliciting, transacting or negotiating in any manner whatever any business relating to vacancies in, to the sale or purchase of, or appointment, nomination, or deputation to, or resignation, transfer, or exchange of any offices, commissions, places, or employment whatever, in or under any further department, then, and in every such case, every such person, and also every other person who shall wilfully and knowingly aid, abet, or assist therein shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 6, any person advertising any office, place, &c., or the name of any person as broker, &c., or printing any advertisement or proposal for such purposes, is liable to a penalty of £50.

Sect. 9 provides that the Act shall not extend to any office excepted from the Act of 1551, nor to any office which was legally saleable before the passing of this Act, and in the gift of any person by virtue of any office of which such person is or shall be possessed under any patent or appointment for his life (e).

e) Ss. 7, 8, and the rest of s. 9 were repealed in 1872 (S. L. R. No. 2).

Sect. 10 provides that the Act shall not extend to prevent or make void any deputation to any office, in any case in which it is lawful to appoint a deputy, or any agreement, &c., lawfully made in respect of any allowance or payment to such principal or deputy respectively, out of the fees or profits of such office (f).

By sect. 11, annual reservations, charges, or payments, out of fees or profits of any office, to any person who shall have held such office, in any commission, or appointment of any person succeeding to such office, and agreements, &c., for securing such reservations, charges, or payments, are also excepted; provided that the amount of the reservations, &c., and the circumstances and reasons under which they shall have been permitted, shall be stated in the commission or instrument of appointment of the successor (g).

By sect. 14, offences against the Acts of 1551 and 1809, by any governor, lieutenant-governor, or person having the chief command, civil or military, in his Majesty's dominions, colonies, or plantations, or his secretary, may be prosecuted and determined in the High Court of Justice in London or Middlesex (h), in the same manner as any crime, &c., committed by any person holding a public employment abroad may be prosecuted under the provisions of the Criminal Jurisdiction Act, 1802 (42 Geo. III. c. 85) (i).

Where by an agreement, reciting that the plaintiff carried on the business of a law stationer, and was sub-distributor of stamps, collector of assessed taxes, and that being desirous of giving up his said business, he had agreed with the defendant for the sale of the same for the sum of £300, it was witnessed that, in consideration of the sum of £300, the plaintiff agreed to sell and the defendant agreed to buy the said business of a law stationer so carried on by the plaintiff, and all his goodwill and interest therein, and that the plaintiff should not at any time afterwards carry on the business of a law stationer, or collect any of the assessed taxes, but would use his utmost endeavours to introduce the defendant to the said business and offices; it was held that the agreement was a contract for the sale of the offices of sub-distributor of stamps and collector of assessed taxes, and illegal within the Acts of 1551 and 1809. It was one entire contract, and the defendant could not be called upon to pay, except upon the performance by the plaintiff of the whole consideration. According to the plain words of the agreement, a part of the consideration was the agreement by the plaintiff to recommend the defendant to the offices, which was prohibited by the statutes (j).

Where a British subject, being a lieutenant in a regiment in the East India service, and divers other officers in the said regiment agreed with A. G., that the said lieutenant and other officers should subscribe and pay to the said A. G., being a major and their senior in the said regiment, and that he should accept from them a certain sum of money in consideration of his resigning his said position as major in the said regiment, and creating a vacancy of major therein, and the money was paid to A. G., and he resigned his said position in pursuance of the said agreement ; it was held that the agreement was illegal, under sect. 4 of the Act of 1809, and that a bond given in pursuance of it was void (k).

The sale of an East India Director's nomination to a cadetship was within sect. 3 of that Act, although by the practice of the Company such nomination is given only in the form of a presentation of the party by the director to the Court of Directors, ' provided he shall appear to ' them ' eligible for that station,' and he must afterwards be examined by the committee appointed for that purpose, and passed : and although the nomination only gives the party, when examined and passed, a right to go out to India, which he must do at his own expense, and obtain a commission on his landing ; but before that time he receives no pay from the Company, and is not under their control. For the object of the enactment was to prevent all corrupt bargains for the sale of patronage in matters of public concernment ; and with that view it is immaterial whether that to which the nomination is sold can be described with most critical correctness by any of the terms, ' office, commission, place, or employment.' And a cadetship may be described in an indictment under the Act as an ' office, commission, place, and employment ' (l).

A., an attorney, who held the offices of clerk of the peace for a liberty, clerk to the commissioners of land and assessed taxes, clerk to the commissioners of sewers, clerk to the magistrates, clerk to the deputy-lieutenants, steward of divers manors, and coroner to the said liberty, entered into articles of partnership with B., by which, after reciting that he held many offices, &c., and that it had been agreed that they should enter into partnership ' in the said business and in the emoluments of the said offices, &c., upon the terms thereafter expressed,' it was agreed that they should enter into partnership for twenty years, and that ' all the profits and emoluments arising from the said offices,' &c., during the said partnership should be considered as partnership property, and distributed accordingly ; it was also agreed that if A. died within the term then, during such period as no son of A. should be a partner in the said business, B. should be interested in one moiety of the said business, and the executors of A. should be entitled to the profits of the other moiety of the said business, to be applied as part of his personal estate ; and it was held that the agreement was not a contract for the sale of an office within the Acts of 1551 and 1809 (m).

Where a count of an indictment for a misdemeanor in the sale of the office of a chaplain in the East Indies, alleged that the defendants unlawfully and corruptly did contract with D. N. to procure the appointment of a certain office and employment under the appointment and control of the East India Company, to wit, the office and employment of a chaplain in India, of a person duly qualified for the said office to be named by the said D. N. in that behalf ; it was held that the count was bad ; for the contract or agreement must be to receive money or profit, and the word 'corruptly' is not sufficient to bring it within the Act (n).

The Act of 1809 did not extend to purchases and exchanges of commissions in his Majesty's forces, at the regulated prices; or to anything done in relation thereto by authorised regimental agents not advertising and not receiving money, &c., in that behalf. But officers receiving, or paying, or agreeing to pay, more than the regulated prices, or paying agents for negotiating, on conviction by a court-martial, forfeited their commissions, and were cashiered.

By 'The Regimental Exchange Act, 1875' (38 & 39 Vict. c. 16), sect. 2, 'his Majesty may, from time to time, by regulation, authorise exchanges to be made by officers in his Majesty's regular forces from one regiment or corps to another regiment or corps, on such conditions as to his Majesty may for the time being seem expedient, and nothing contained in the Army Brokerage Acts (o) shall extend to any exchanges made in manner authorised by any regulation of his Majesty for the time being in force.'

By an Act of 1688 (1 Will. & M. c. 21), it is made unlawful for any custos rotulorum or other person who has the right to nominate, elect, or appoint a clerk of the peace (p) to sell the place or take any bond or assurance or to have any reward, fee, money, or profit, directly or indirectly, to him or to any other person for nominating, &c. If the appointing authority sells or the clerk buys the place each forfeits his office and double the sum or value of what is given or received, recoverable by action by a common informer, sect. 7 (p). The clerk must, on taking office, swear that he has not given nor will give anything for his appointment (sect. 8).

By the Clerk of Assize (Ireland) Act, 1821 (1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 54), the Act of 1809 (q) is extended 'to prevent the sale or brokerage of the office of clerk of assize or nisi prius or judges' registrar in Ireland in as full and ample manner as if these offices had been mentioned in the Act of 1809 to all intents and purposes whatsoever' (sect. 7).

By the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55, s. 19), 'a sheriff shall not let to farm his county or any part thereof.'

By sect. 27, 'A person shall not directly or indirectly by himself or by any person in trust for him or for his use buy, sell, let, or take to farm the office of under-sheriff, deputy sheriff, bailiff, or any other office or place appertaining to the office of sheriff, nor contract for promise or grant for any valuable consideration whatever any such office or place, nor give promise or receive any valuable consideration whatever for any such office or place. Any person acting in contravention of the section not being an under-sheriff, deputy sheriff, bailiff, or sheriff's officer is to be punished as if he were such' (r).

(o) Defined by s. 3 as meaning 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 16, and 49 Geo. III. c. 126, ante, pp. 620, 621.

(p) The office would seem to be within 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 16. The appointment to the office is now made in counties in England by the joint committee of justices and the county council (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41, s. 83), and in boroughs by the town council (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, s. 154).

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

BRIBERY AND CORRUPTION.

SECT. I.—BRIBERY OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

BRIBERY is the receiving or offering any undue reward by or to any person whatsoever, in a public office, in order to influence his behaviour in office, and incline him to act contrary to the known rules of honesty and integrity (a). 'Whenever a person is bound by law to act without any view to his private emolument, and another by a corrupt contract engages such person on condition of the payment of money or other lucrative consideration to act in a manner which he shall prescribe, both parties are by such contract guilty of bribery' (b).

It is an indictable misdemeanor at common law to bribe or to attempt to bribe (c) any person holding a public office, and for any person in an official position corruptly to use the power or interest of his position for rewards or promises, by asking for or accepting a bribe. Thus a clerk to the agent for French prisoners of war was indicted for taking bribes from the prisoners in order to obtain the exchange of some of them out of their turn (d).

It is immaterial whether the office is an office of the State (e), or in a public department (f), or is judicial (g), or ministerial (h), or municipal (i), or parochial (j).

As to bribery of jurymen, see 'Embracery,' ante, p. 598. As to bribery to obtain a public office, see 1 Hawk. c. 67, s. 3, and ante, p. 619. As to bribery in connection with elections, see post, p. 636. By 31 Eliz. c. 6, penalties are imposed with reference to bribery and corruption in the election, presentation, or nomination of fellows, scholars, &c., in churches, colleges, schools, hospitals, halls, or societies, and to simony and corrupt institution to or resignation of benefices. Bribery is now an extradition crime (jj).

SECT. II.—CORRUPTION IN MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS.

Corruption.—By the Public Bodies (Corrupt Practices) Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 69), sect. 1—

(1) ‘Every person who shall, by himself, or by or in conjunction with any other person, corruptly solicit or receive, or agree to receive for himself or for any other person, any gift, loan, fee, reward, or advantage (k) whatever, as an inducement to, or reward for, or otherwise on account of any member, officer, or servant of a public body, as in this Act defined (l), doing, or forbearing to do anything in respect of any matter or transaction whatsoever, actual or proposed, in which the said public body is concerned shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.’

(2) ‘Every person who shall by himself or by or in conjunction with any other person, corruptly give, promise, or offer any gift, loan, fee, award, or advantage whatsoever, to any person whether for the benefit of that person, or of another person, as an inducement to, or reward for, or otherwise, on account of any member, officer, or servant of any public body, as in this Act defined, doing, or forbearing to do, anything in respect of any matter or transaction whatsoever, actual or proposed, in which such public body as aforesaid is concerned, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.’

Punishment.—By sect. 2, ‘Any person, on conviction, for offending as aforesaid, shall, at the discretion of the Court before which he is convicted—

- a. be liable to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, or to pay a fine not exceeding £500, or to both such imprisonment and such fine ; and
- b. in addition, be liable to be ordered to pay to such body, and in such manner as the Court directs, the amount or value of any gift, loan, fee, or reward received by him, or any part thereof ; and
- c. be liable to be judged incapable of being elected or appointed to any public office (m) for seven years from the date of his conviction, and to forfeit any such office held by him at the time of his conviction, and
- d. in the event of a second conviction for a like offence, he shall, in addition to the foregoing penalties, be liable to be adjudged forever incapable of holding any public office (m) and to be incapable for seven years of being registered as being an elector, or voting at an election, either of members to serve in Parliament or of members of any public body, and the enactments for preventing the voting and registration of persons declared, by reason of corrupt practices, to be incapable of voting, shall apply to a person adjudged in pursuance of this section to be incapable of voting ; and
- e. if such person is an officer or servant in the employ of any public body, upon such conviction, he shall, at the discretion of the Court, be liable to forfeit his right and claim to any compensation or pension to which he would otherwise have been entitled.'

Savings as to Offences under Other Laws.—By sect. 3 (1) 'Where an offence under this Act is also punishable under any other enactment or at common law, such offence may be prosecuted and punished either under this Act, or under the other enactment, or at common law, but so that no person shall be punished twice for the same offence' (n).

(2) 'A person shall not be exempt from punishment under this Act by reason of the invalidity of the appointment or election of a person to a public office.'

By sect. 4, 'A prosecution for an offence under this Act shall not be instituted except by or with the consent of the Attorney-General,' i.e. the Attorney or Solicitor-General for England or Ireland and the Lord Advocate as respects Scotland (subsect. 2) (o).

By sect. 6, 'A Court of general or quarter sessions shall in England have jurisdiction to inquire and hear and determine an offence under this Act.'

By sect. 7, 'The expression "public body" means any council of a county or council of a city or town, any council of a municipal borough, also any board, commissioners, select vestry, or other body which has power to act under and for the purposes of any Act relating to local government or the public health or to poor law, or otherwise to administer money raised by rates in pursuance of any public general Act, but does not include any public body as above defined existing elsewhere than in the United Kingdom. The expression "public office" means any office or employment of a person as member, officer, or servant of such public body. The expression "person" includes a body of persons, corporate or incorporate (p). The expression "advantage" includes any office or dignity and any forbearance to demand any money or money's worth or valuable thing, and includes any aid, vote, consent, or influence, or pretended aid, vote, consent, or influence, and also includes any promise or procurement of or agreement or endeavour to procure, or the holding out of any expectation of any gift, loan, fee, reward, or advantage as before defined' (q).

SECT. III.—CORRUPTION OF AGENTS IN BUSINESS, &c.

Punishment of Corrupt Transactions with Agents.—By the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. c. 34) (r), by sect. 1,

'(1) If any agent corruptly accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept or attempts to obtain, from any person, for himself or for any other person, any gift or consideration as an inducement or reward for doing or forbearing to do, or for having after the passing of this Act done or forborne to do, any act in relation to his principal's affairs or business, or for shewing or forbearing to shew favour or disfavour to any person in relation to his principal's affairs or business; or

(o) S. 5 as to costs is repealed by 8 Edw. VII. c. 15, post, Bk. xii. c. v.

(p) Vide ante, p. 3.

(q) S. 8 adapts the Act to Scotland. S. 9 relates to proceedings in Ireland.

(r) The Act was passed August 4, 1906, and came into force on January 1, 1907.

If any person corruptly gives or agrees to give or offers any gift or consideration to any agent as an inducement or reward for doing or forbearing to do, or for having after the passing of this Act done or forborne to do, any act in relation to his principal's affairs or business, or for shewing or forbearing to shew favour or disfavour to any person in relation to his principal's affairs or business; or

If any person knowingly gives to any agent, or if any agent knowingly uses with intent to deceive his principal, any receipt, account, or other document in respect of which the principal is interested, and which contains any statement which is false or erroneous or defective in any material particular, and which to his knowledge is intended to mislead the principal;

he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding two years, or to a fine not exceeding five hundred pounds, or to both such imprisonment and such fine, or on summary conviction to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding four months, or to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds, or to both such imprisonment and such fine.

(2) For the purposes of this Act the expression "consideration" includes valuable consideration of any kind; the expression "agent" includes any person employed by or acting for another; and the expression "principal" includes an employer.

(3) A person serving under the Crown or under any corporation or any municipal, borough, county, or district council, or any board of guardians, is an agent within the meaning of this Act' (s).

Prosecution of Offences.—By sect. 2, '(1) A prosecution for an offence under this Act shall not be instituted without the consent, in England of the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General, and in Ireland of the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General for Ireland.

(2) The Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 17), as amended by any subsequent enactment (t), shall apply to offences under this Act as if they were included among the offences mentioned in section one of that Act.

(3) Every information for any offence under this Act shall be upon oath (u).

(5) A Court of quarter sessions shall not have jurisdiction to inquire of, hear, and determine prosecutions on indictments for offences under this Act.

(6) Any person aggrieved by a summary conviction under this Act may appeal to a Court of quarter sessions.'

Sea Fishery Apprentices.—By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 398, 'If any person (a) receives any money or valuable consideration from the person to whom an apprentice in the sea-fishing service is bound, or to whom a sea-fishing boy (v) is bound

(s) S. 1 extends to Scotland, subject to a provision that proceedings with a view to summary conviction are to lie before the sheriff (s. 3).

by any agreement, or from any one on that person's behalf, or from the apprentice or boy or any one on the apprentice's or boy's behalf in consideration of the apprentice or boy being so bound ; or (b) makes or causes any such payment to be made, that person shall in respect of each offence be guilty of a misdemeanor whether the apprentice or boy was or was not validly bound.'

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

OF OFFENCES WITH REFERENCE TO THE REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS AND VOTING, ETC., AT ELECTIONS.

SECT. I.—OFFENCES IN CONNECTION WITH THE PREPARATION OF ELECTORAL REGISTERS.

WILFUL neglect or breach of duty by officials under the Acts relating to the registration of electors appears not to be indictable (a); being in most if not all cases specifically and summarily punishable under the Acts (b).

By the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18), s. 41, a revising barrister has power to administer an oath to all persons examined before him, 'and all parties whether claiming or objecting or objected to; and all persons whatsoever may be examined on oath touching the matters in question; and every person taking an oath or affirmation under this Act who shall wilfully swear or affirm falsely shall be deemed guilty of perjury.'

By the County Voters Registration Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 36), s. 11, 'Any person falsely or fraudulently signing any such declaration (c), in the name of any other person, whether such person shall be living or dead; and every person transmitting as genuine any false or falsified declaration, knowing the same to be false or falsified, and any person knowingly and wilfully making any false statement of fact in such declaration, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and punishable by fine or imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, and the revising barrister shall have power to impound any such declaration.'

By the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 25, 'If any person falsely or fraudulently signs any such declaration [as last aforesaid] (d), or any declaration either as claimant or witness in respect of a claim to vote as a lodger in the name of any other person whether that person is living or dead, or in a fictitious name, or sends as genuine any false or falsified declaration knowing the same to be false or falsified, or knowingly and wilfully makes any false statement of fact in any declaration of the nature aforesaid, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and punishable by fine or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, and the revising barrister shall have power to impound such declaration.'

SECT. II.—OFFICIAL MISCONDUCT WITH REFERENCE TO ELECTIONS.

(a) Misconduct by the Returning Officer and his Staff.

Wilful delay, neglect, or refusal duly to return any person who ought to be returned to Parliament is dealt with under sect. 48 of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), without prejudice to any power of Parliament to punish the officer (e).

Wilful misfeasance by a returning officer or presiding officer or clerk in the execution of his office would seem to be a misdemeanor indictable at common law; in addition to the penalties incurred under sect. 11 of the Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33), and sect. 61 (1) of the Corrupt, &c., Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 51).

By sect. 50 of the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), 'No returning officer for any county or borough, nor his deputy, nor any partner or clerk of either of them shall act as agent for any candidate in the management or conduct of his election as a member to serve in Parliament for such county or borough and if any returning officer, his deputy, the partner, or clerk of either of them shall so act, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor (f).

Mayors.—The duties of mayors as to elections for Parliament are prescribed by the Acts above stated. Their duties as to municipal elections are prescribed by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50) (g). By sect. 75 they incur liability to a fine recoverable by action for neglecting or refusing to conduct or declare an election.

(b) Neglect or Delay in Delivering Parliamentary Election Writs.

The Parliamentary Writs Act, 1813 (53 Geo. III. c. 89), enacts (s. 1) that the messenger, or pursuivant of the great seal, or his deputy, shall, after the receipt of such writs, forthwith carry such of them as shall be directed to the sheriffs of London or Middlesex, to the respective officers of such sheriffs, and the other writs to the general post-office in London, and there deliver them to the postmaster-general for the time being, or to such other person as the postmaster shall depute to receive the same (which deputation the postmaster is thereby required to make),

(e) Rogers on Elections (18th ed.), Vol. ii. p. 81. May, Parl. Pr. (11th ed.). 2 Douglas, Election Cases, (2nd ed.), 177.

(f) This section is applied by s. 11 of the Ballot Act, 1872, to any returning officer or officer appointed by him in pursuance of that Act, and to his partner or clerk.

(g) These duties were formerly regulated by 11 Geo. I. c. 4, s. 6, on which see R. v.

Corry, 5 East, 372, where it was held that voluntary absence from an election was not indictable unless presence was necessary to constitute a legal meeting of the corporation for the election. That Act was repealed as to boroughs subject to the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), by s. 5 of that Act; and repealed in toto in 1887. (S. L. R.)

who, on receipt thereof, shall give an acknowledgment in writing, expressing therein the time of delivery, and shall keep a duplicate of such acknowledgment signed by the parties respectively to whom and by whom the same shall be so delivered; and that the postmaster or his deputy shall despatch all such writs free of postage, by the first post or mail, after the receipt thereof, under covers directed to the proper officers, to whom the said writs shall be respectively directed, accompanied with proper directions to the postmaster or deputy postmaster of the place, or nearest to the place where such officers shall hold their office, requiring such postmaster or deputy forthwith to carry such writs respectively to such office, and to deliver them there to the officers to whom they shall be respectively directed, or their deputies, who are required to give to such postmaster or deputy a memorandum in writing, acknowledging the receipt of every such writ, and setting forth the day and the hour the same was delivered by such postmaster or deputy, and which memorandum shall also be signed by such postmaster or deputy, who is required to transmit the same by the first or second post afterwards to the postmaster general or his deputy at the general post-office in London, who are required to make an entry thereof in a proper book for that purpose, and to file the memorandum along with the duplicate of the said acknowledgment, signed by the messenger, to the intent that the same may be inspected or produced upon all proper occasions by any person interested in such elections.

The statute, after directing that all persons to whom the writs for the election of members to Parliament ought to be and are usually directed, shall, within a month after the passing of the Act (July 2, 1813) send to the postmaster-general an account of the places where they shall hold their offices, and so from time to time, as often as such places shall be changed; and of the post town nearest to such offices; or in case any such office shall be in the cities of London, Westminster, or the borough of Southwark, or within five miles thereof, shall send such account to the messenger of the great seal (h).

By sect. 6, 'Every person concerned in the transmitting or delivery of any such writ as aforesaid who shall wilfully neglect or delay to deliver or transmit any such writ, or accept any fee, or do any other matter or thing in violation of this Act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and may upon any conviction upon any indictment or information in his Majesty's Court of King's Bench be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the Court for such misdemeanor' (i).

(h) Ss. 2, 3. The portions omitted from ss. 2, 3 were repealed in 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 91, s. 2). S. 4 was repealed by the Great Seal Offices Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 81), which makes provision for the transfer of the duties of the messenger or pursuivant of the great seal to an officer to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor (ss. 4, 12). S. 5 forbids the messenger of the great seal and his deputies to receive or take any fee or gratuity for conveyance or delivery of the writs. So much of the section as commuted fees formerly payable was repealed in 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 91). S. L. R.

(i) This was the rule under the old law. Coombe v. Pitt, 1 W. Bl. 523. For old decisions on election petitions, see Douglas, Election Cases (2nd ed.), 1802.

SECT. III.—CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

(a) Definitions of Corrupt Practices, &c.

Parliament.—The statute law relating to corrupt and illegal practices at Parliamentary elections is now embodied in the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Acts, 1883 and 1895, and the enactments scheduled thereto, and in the Public Meetings Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 66), s. 1.

Definitions.—By the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102), s. 38, ‘Throughout this Act, in the construction thereof, except there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction, . . . the word “election” shall mean the election of any member or members to serve in Parliament; and the words “returning officer” shall apply to any person or persons to whom, by virtue of his or their office under any law, custom, or statute, the execution of any writ or precept doth or shall belong for the election of a member or members to serve in Parliament, by whatever name or title such person or persons may be called; . . . and the word “voter” shall mean any person who has or claims to have a right to vote in the election of a member or members to serve in Parliament.’

By the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 51), s. 64, ‘In this Act unless the context otherwise requires—

The expression “election” means the election of a member or members to serve in Parliament.

The expression “election petition” means a petition presented in pursuance of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), as amended by this Act.

The expression “election Court” means the judges presiding at the trial of an election petition or, if the matter comes before the High Court, that Court.

The expression “person” includes an association or body of persons corporate or incorporate, and where any act is done by any such association or body, the members of such association or body who have taken part in the commission of such act shall be liable to any fine or punishment imposed for the same by this Act.

The expression “indictment” includes information.

The expression “costs” includes costs and charges and expenses.’

Corrupt Practice.—By the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 51), s. 3, ‘The expression “corrupt practice” as used in this Act, means any of the following offences: namely, treating (j) and undue influence (k) as defined in this Act, and bribery (l), and personation (m) as defined by the enactments set forth in part iii. of the third schedule to this Act, and aiding, abetting, counselling, and procuring the commission of the offence of personation, and every offence which is a corrupt practice within the meaning of this Act shall be a corrupt practice within the meaning of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), supra.

Municipal Elections.—The law as to corrupt practices in municipal elections is contained in the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, as amended in 1884.

By the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), part iv. (Corrupt Practices), s. 77, ‘In this part, bribery, treating, undue influence, and personation, include respectively anything done, before, at, after, or with respect to a municipal election which, if done before, or after, or with respect to a parliamentary election, would make the person doing the same liable to any penalty, punishment, or disqualification for bribery, treating, undue influence, or personation as the case may be under any Act for the time being in force with respect to parliamentary elections’ (n).

By the Municipal Election, Corrupt, &c., Practices Prevention Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 70), s. 2 (1), ‘The expression “corrupt practices” means in this Act any of the following offences, namely, bribery, treating, undue influence, and personation, as defined in the enactments set forth in part i. of the third schedule to this Act (o), and aiding, abetting, counselling, and procuring the commission of the offence of personation.’

Subsect. (2), ‘A person who commits any corrupt practice in reference to a municipal election shall be guilty of a like offence, and shall on conviction be liable to the like punishment and be subject to the like incapacities as if the corrupt practice had been committed at a parliamentary election.’

The statutory provisions as to corrupt practices at municipal elections apply to elections of the mayor, aldermen, or councillors, auditors, &c., of a municipal borough, of improvement commissioners (p), to county council elections (q), to elections in the City of London (r), subject to the provisions of a local Act (50 & 51 Vict. c. xiii.), and of metropolitan borough councillors (s), councillors of urban (t) and rural (u) districts, and of rural parishes (v), and guardians of urban districts (w), and in London (x).

Punishment.—By 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, s. 6 (1), ‘A person who commits any corrupt practice other than personation or aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of the offence of personation, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction on indictment, shall be liable to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding one year, or to be fined any sum not exceeding £200.’

(2) ‘A person who commits the offence of personation, or of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of that offence (y), (n) Ss. 78–80, 82–84 of part iv. are repealed and replaced by the Municipal Elections Corrupt, &c., Practices Prevention Act, 1884 (temp.).

shall be guilty of felony, and any person convicted thereof on indictment shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, together with hard labour.'

Subsect. (3) provides for disqualification for seven years of any person convicted of a corrupt practice, in addition to the punishment above provided.

(b) Bribery at Elections.

Common Law.—'Bribery at elections for members of Parliament must undoubtedly always have been a crime at common law,' and consequently punishable by indictment or information (z).

The offence consists in corruptly and illegally giving rewards or making promises of rewards of money or money's worth in order to procure votes for members to serve in Parliament (a). Thus giving refreshments to voters before they vote in order to induce them to vote for a particular candidate, is bribery at common law (b).

Bribery in connection with the election to a municipal (c) or parochial (d) office appears to be a misdemeanor at common law.

Statute.—The statutory definition of bribery (e) applies both to parliamentary (f) and to municipal elections (g).

By the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102), s. 2 (h), 'The following persons shall be deemed guilty of bribery, and shall be punishable accordingly—

(1) 'Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf (i), give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or shall offer (j), promise (k), or promise to procure, or to endeavour to procure, any money, or valuable consideration, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce any voter to vote, or refrain from voting, or shall tinued by the Expiring Laws Continuance Act (vide 8 Edw. VII. c. 18).

(i) Where a friend of the candidate gave an elector five guineas to vote, and took from him a note for that sum, but at the same time gave a counter note to deliver up the first note when the elector had voted, the gift was held absolute and to be bribery within 2 Geo. II. c. 24. Sulston v. Norton, 3 Burr. 1235. Cf. Cooper v. Slade, 6 H. L. C. 746. As to bribery by giving cards to electors which were taken to another person, who paid money to the electors, see Webb v. Smith, 4 Bing. (N. C.) 373.

(j) Acceptance is not necessary to constitute the offence. Coventry case [1869], 1 O'M. & H. 107.

(k) A letter was written to an out-voter, requesting him to come to a borough, and record his vote for S. A postscript added, 'Your railway expenses will be paid.' The voter did come and vote as requested: his travelling expenses were paid. Held, that the promise and payment constituted only one act of bribery within this section. Cooper v. Slade, 6 H. L. C. 746.

corruptly (l) do any such act as aforesaid, on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election (ll) :

(2) ' Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, give or procure, or agree to give or procure, or offer, promise, or promise to procure, or to endeavour to procure, any office, place, or employment (m) to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce such voter to vote, or refrain from voting, or shall corruptly do any such act as aforesaid, on account of any voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election :

(3) ' Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf (n), make any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement as aforesaid, to or for any person, in order to induce such person to procure, or endeavour to procure, the return of any person to serve in Parliament, or the vote of any voter at any election (o) :

(4) ' Every person who shall, upon or in consequence of any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement, or agreement, procure or engage, promise, or endeavour to procure the return of any person to serve in Parliament, or the vote of any voter at any election :

(5) ' Every person who shall advance or pay, or cause to be paid, any money to or to the use of any other person with the intent that such money or any part thereof shall be expended in bribery at any election, or who shall knowingly pay or cause to be paid any money to any person in discharge or repayment of any money wholly or in part expended in bribery at any election.' (Here follows a proviso excepting legal expenses bona fide incurred.)

Sect. 3 (p). ' The following persons shall also be deemed guilty of bribery, and shall be punishable accordingly—

(1) ' Every voter who shall, before or during any election, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, receive, agree, or contract for any money, gift, loan, or valuable consideration, office, place, or employment for himself or for any other person, for voting or agreeing to vote, or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting, at any election :

(2) ' Every person who shall, after any election, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, receive any money or valuable consideration on account of any person having voted or refrained from voting, or having induced any other person to vote or to refrain from voting, at any election. . . . (o) In Henslow v. Fawcett, 3 A. & E. 51, an action for penalties under 2 Geo. II. c. 24, s. 7 (rep.), for giving money to induce a man to vote, it was held that the penalty was incurred even if the vote was not given or the recipient of the bribe never meant to vote as desired. In Harding v. Stokes [1837], 2 M. & W. 233, an action under 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76, s. 54 (rep.), for corrupting a voter in a municipal election, the offence was held to be complete when the bribe was offered and accepted, and the promise made to vote as desired, even if the promise were broken or was never meant to be kept.

(p) Also included in sched. 3 of the Corrupt, &c., Practices Prevention Acts, 1883 and 1884, supra.

s. 49, 'Any person, either directly or indirectly, corruptly paying any rate on behalf of any ratepayer for the purpose of enabling him to be registered as a voter, thereby to influence his vote at any future election, and any candidate or other person, either directly or indirectly, paying any rate on behalf of any voter for the purpose of inducing him to vote or refrain from voting, shall be guilty of bribery, and be punishable accordingly; and any person on whose behalf, and with whose privity any such payment as in this section is mentioned, is made, shall also be guilty of bribery, and punishable accordingly' (g). For punishment see 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, s. 6, ante, p. 637.

Most of the decisions relating to bribery are on election petitions and not on indictments for the offence. Where a test ballot was resorted to in order to determine which of three candidates should stand, it was held that bribery at such test ballot was within sect. 2, subsect. 3 of the Act of 1854 (r). It is bribery to make payments to a voter for loss of time while going to deliver his vote (s); or corruptly to pay rates for the purpose of enabling a ratepayer to be registered and influencing his vote at a future election (t), or to make payment corruptly for attendance at a revising Court (u), or to give money to induce a voter to vote under colour of a bet (v). It has never been decided that a wager upon an election is bribery per se, but if made corruptly there can be little doubt that it would be so (w). A corrupt promise of refreshments to voters to induce them to vote is bribery (x). And the giving of money ostensibly for the purpose of charity may be an act of bribery if done corruptly, of which the excessive or indiscriminate nature of the gifts may be evidence (y). So also it seems payment of money to induce a person to personate a voter is bribery (z). A voter may be bribed though he is disqualified (a). It is immaterial at what time before the election the act of bribery is committed if it be done with a view to influence a voter at a coming election (b).

It seems that payment of money to a voter after the election is over for having voted is not bribery unless there was a corrupt promise before the election to pay him (c). In 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 2 (1), the word 'corruptly' is inserted only as to payments after elections. (Vide ante, p. 639.)

Gardiner, 1 B. & C. 297.

A parliamentary election was about to take place at C. ; S. was one of the candidates. In the committee-room of S. the question was discussed whether paying the expense of bringing up out-voters was legal. S., after referring to a law-book, said that it was, but limited it to the payment of expenses out of pocket. A circular had been previously prepared and printed, requesting out-voters to come up and vote for S. Upon S. making this declaration of his opinion, a clerk to an agent of S. (without any express direction from S. or from the agent) wrote at the bottom of each circular, 'Your railway expenses will be paid.' A voter who resided at H. received one of the circulars with this added note ; he came to C., voted for S., and afterwards received the sum of 8s., the expenses to which he had bona fide been put by his journey. It was held, that the words added to the circular must be treated as written by the authority of S. ; that the promise and payment were forbidden by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 2, ante, p. 638, and that for the purposes of that statute they must be treated as 'corruptly' made (d). If a man employs an agent to corrupt voters, and that agent in carrying such general instructions into effect employs subordinate agents within the scope of the authority received from the principal, it would seem that the principal, with reference to the express terms of this statute, as well as upon general principles of law, will be guilty of a misdemeanor (e).

Bribery is not triable at quarter sessions (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 10).

Voting by Agents, &c.—By the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), s. 11, 'No elector who within six months before or during any election for any county or borough shall have been retained, hired, or employed for all or any of the purposes of the election for reward by or on behalf of any candidate at such election as agent, canvasser, clerk, messenger, or in other like employment, shall be entitled to vote at such election, and if he shall so vote he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor' (f).

(c) Treating.

By the Corrupt, &c., Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 51), s. 1, (1) 'Any person who corruptly by himself or by any other person, either before, during or after an election, directly or indirectly gives or provides, or pays wholly or in part the expense of giving or providing any meat, drink, entertainment or provision to or for any person for the purpose of corruptly influencing that person or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote at the election, or on account of such person or any other person having voted or refrained from voting, or being about to vote or refrain from voting, at such election, shall be guilty of treating.

(2) 'And every elector who corruptly accepts or takes any such meat, drink, entertainment or provision, shall also be guilty of treating.' This is extended to municipal elections (47 & 48 Vict. c. 70, s. 2, sched. 3, part i.). For punishment see 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, s. 6, ante, p. 637. The offence is not triable at quarter sessions (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 10). A corrupt promise of refreshments to voters to induce them to vote has been held bribery (g).

(d) Undue Influence.

By the Corrupt, &c., Practices Prevention Act, 1883, sect. 2, 'Every person who shall directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf make use of or threaten to make use of any force, violence, or restraint, or inflict, or threaten to inflict by himself or by any other person any temporal or spiritual injury, damage, harm or loss upon or against any person in order to induce or compel such person to vote or refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting at any election, or who shall by abduction, duress or any fraudulent device or contrivance, impede or prevent the free exercise of the franchise of any elector, or shall thereby compel, induce or prevail upon any elector either to give or to refrain from giving his vote at any election, shall be guilty of undue influence' (h). This section is extended to municipal, &c., elections (47 & 48 Vict. c. 70, s. 2, and sched. 3, part i.). For punishment see 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, s. 6, ante, p. 637. The offence is not triable at quarter sessions (i).

(e) Personation.

It does not seem to be clear whether personation of a voter at an election is an offence at common law (j). By the Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33), s. 24 (k), 'the following enactments shall be made with respect to personation at parliamentary and municipal elections :

'A person shall, for all purposes of the law relating to parliamentary (l) and municipal elections be deemed to be guilty of the offence of personation who at an election for a county or borough, or at a municipal election (m), applies for a ballot paper in the name of some other person, whether that name be that of a person living or dead (n), or of a fictitious person (o), or who, having voted once at any such election, applies at the same election for a ballot paper in his own name. . . .'

'It shall be the duty of the returning officer to institute a prosecution against any person whom he may believe to have been guilty of personation, or of aiding, abetting, counselling, or procuring the commission of

(j) In R. v. Bent, 1 Den. 157 : 2 C. & K. 179, it seems to have been considered that personation at a municipal election was not an offence at common law. This opinion was doubted in R. v. Clarke [1900], 2 Ir. Rep. 304, Palles, C.B. See also R. v. Thompson, 2 M. & Rob. 355.

In R. v. Turner, 12 Cox, 313, on an indictment under this section for an offence at a municipal election, it was ruled not to be necessary to produce the charter of the city.

(n) Under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 105, s. 13, it was held that there could be no personation of a dead voter. Whiteley v. Chapell, 11 Cox, 307.

the offence of personation by any person, at the election for which he is returning officer, [and the costs and expenses of the prosecutor and the witnesses in such case, together with compensation for their trouble and loss of time, shall be allowed by the Court in the same manner in which Courts are empowered to allow the same in cases of felony]’ (p).

‘The provisions of the Registration Acts (q), specified in the third schedule to this Act, shall in England and Ireland respectively apply to personation under this Act in the same manner as they apply to a person who knowingly personates and falsely assumes to vote in the name of another person as mentioned in the said Acts. . . .’ By 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, s. 6, personation is made a felony. As to punishment see ante, p. 637. The offence is not triable at quarter sessions (r).

By 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 9 (rep.), if, pending or after any election of councillors, auditors, or assessors, any person shall personate, or induce any other person to personate, any person entitled to vote at such election, &c., he might be summarily convicted by two justices. H., pending an annual election of councillors, gave a nomination paper signed by one B. to F., and asked him to take it to a schoolroom and vote. F. said it was not his name that was on it. H. told him to vote for W. and T., and said he was to take the paper and put it down before a gentleman he would see sitting, and that they would not say anything to him. F. took the paper, and put it into the hands of the presiding officer at the schoolroom for the reception of votes for the said ward; and the officer, being so required, asked F., ‘Are you the person whose name is signed as B. to the voting paper now delivered by you?’ and F. answered, ‘No.’ B.’s name was at the time on the burgess roll. The voting paper was not filed, nor was the vote of B. recorded in consequence of the paper being so handed in. Two justices convicted H. for inducing F. to personate B. at the said election, and the sessions, on appeal, confirmed the conviction, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen’s Bench, whether H. had, under the above facts, committed the alleged offence; and it was urged that, as F. did not vote, and on being asked, at once declared that he was not B., he had not been guilty of personation, and therefore H. had not been guilty of inducing him to commit it. But it was held that if a man goes up to a voting place and represents himself as another person, it is a false personation. Here F. gave in a voting paper, and so represented himself to be another person, and thereby the personation was complete (s).

1. Are you the same person whose name appears as A. B. on the register of voters, now in force for the county of ——— [or for the ——— riding, parts or ——— division of the county of ———] or for the city [or borough] of ——— [as the case may be] ?

By sect. 10 of the Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33), 'any presiding officer and any clerk appointed by the returning officer to attend at a polling station, shall have the power of asking questions and administering the oath authorised by law to be asked of and administered to voters. . . .'

An indictment against a voter under 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45, s. 58 (a), for giving a false answer at an election seems to have been insufficient if it merely stated that the voter gave the answer at an election, and did not aver the writ for holding the election, or that the election was duly held (b).

On an indictment under 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45, s. 58, it was held that the word 'wilfully' must be for giving a false answer at the poll, construed in the same way, and supported by the same sort of evidence, as in an indictment for perjury. To be untrue is not enough; for to be wilful it must have been false to the knowledge of the party at the time (c).

The first four counts of an indictment upon sect. 34 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1835 (d), stated that the defendant, upon delivering in a voting paper, in the name of a burgess entitled to vote at the election, was asked by the presiding officer the three questions in the terms of the Act, and then alleged, 'to which questions (each of the two first) the defendant then and there falsely and fraudulently answered, "I am."' Williams, J., after consulting Patteson, J., held that these four counts were bad for omitting the word wilfully. 'Wilfully to make a false answer to the question' proposed was the definition of the offence by the legislature itself, and it was a safe and certain rule that the words of the statute must be pursued (e). The prisoner was indicted for falsely answering a question at a municipal election under the same section. The prisoner's father, W. G., had been a burges sin St. Albans and those names remained on the overseer's lists; but he had been absent from home for a considerable time; and the prisoner, whose name was also W., resided in the same house, and paid the parish rates, &c. At a municipal election the prisoner offered to vote, and being asked, 'Are you the person whose name appears as W. G. on the burgess roll now in force?' answered 'Yes.' There was only one W. G. on the roll. Wightman, J., held that there was no case against the prisoner (f).

Sects. 7-12 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, and sects. 1, 2 of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 40) (g) deal with illegal practices, and sects. 7-13 of the Act of 1883 with illegal payments or hirings (h). These are all punishable on summary conviction subject to an appeal to quarter sessions (s. 10) and to the power to convict of an illegal practice on an indictment for a corrupt practice (s. 52, post, p. 649). Illegal practices, &c., at municipal elections are dealt with by sects. 4-18 of the Municipal Elections (Corrupt, &c., Practices) Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 70).

(h) Offences Relating to Nomination and Voting Papers.

By the Ballot Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33) (i), sect. 3, 'every person who

- (1) Forges or fraudulently defaces or fraudulently destroys any nomination paper, or delivers to the returning officer any nomination paper, knowing the same to be forged ; or
- (2) Forges or counterfeits or fraudulently defaces or fraudulently destroys any ballot paper or the official mark on any ballot paper ; or
- (3) Without due authority supplies any ballot paper to any person ; or
- (4) Fraudulently puts into any ballot box any paper other than the ballot paper which he is authorised by law to put in ; or
- (5) Fraudulently takes out of the polling station any ballot paper ; or
- (6) Without due authority destroys, takes, opens, or otherwise interferes with any ballot box or packet of ballot papers then in use for the purposes of the election ;

shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable, if he is a returning officer or an officer or clerk in attendance at a polling station, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and if he is any other person, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour.'

Any attempt to commit any offence specified in this section shall be punishable in the manner in which the offence itself is punishable.

In any indictment or other prosecution for an offence in relation to the nomination papers, ballot boxes, ballot papers, and marking instruments at an election, the property in such papers, boxes, and instruments may be stated to be in the returning officer at such elections, as well as the property in the counterfoils (j).

Municipal Elections.—By the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 74, ‘ If any person forges or fraudulently defaces or fraudulently destroys any nomination paper, or delivers to the town clerk any forged nomination paper, knowing it to be forged, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour.

‘ (2) An attempt to commit such an offence shall be punishable as the offence is punishable.’

By sect. 58 of that Act, sect. 3 of the Ballot Act, 1872, supra, is applied to contested municipal elections (l).

(i) Offences After an Election.

False Declaration as to Election Expenses.—46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, s. 33, provides that a declaration as to expenses shall be made by the candidate, and a return of such expenses by his agent ; and by sub-sect. 7, ‘ If any candidate or election agent knowingly makes the declaration required by this section falsely he shall be guilty of an offence, and on conviction thereof on indictment shall be liable to the punishment for wilful and corrupt perjury ; such offence shall also be deemed to be a corrupt practice within the meaning of this Act ’ (m).

Improper Withdrawal of Election Petition.—By 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, s. 41, sub-sect. 4, ‘ If any person makes any agreement or terms, or enters into any undertaking in relation to the withdrawal of an election petition, and such agreement, terms or undertaking is or are for the withdrawal of the election petition in consideration of any payment, or in consideration that the seat shall at any time be vacated, or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other election petition, or is or are (whether lawful or unlawful) not mentioned in the aforesaid affidavits (n), he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months, and to a fine not exceeding £200 ’ (o).

Wide powers are given to Courts for the trial of election petitions to punish summarily persons guilty at elections of corrupt and illegal practices, which do not fall within the scope of this work (p).

and in any action or proceeding for any penalty for bribery, treating, or undue influence, it shall be sufficient to allege that the defendant was at the election at or in connection with which the offence is intended to be alleged to have been committed guilty of bribery, treating, or undue influence (as the case may require); and in any criminal or civil proceedings in relation to any such offence the certificate of the returning officer in this behalf shall be sufficient evidence of the due holding of the election (r), and of any person therein named having been a candidate thereat.'

This section is extended by 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, s. 53, infra, to indictments for corrupt practices as defined ante, p. 636. On an indictment for personation at an election held before this Act, it was ruled that the election writ or an examined copy must be put in evidence (s). It is not necessary under the present law to allege in the indictment or prove that the presiding officer at the polling station at which the personation is charged to have occurred was duly appointed (t).

An indictment for a corrupt practice which does not specifically describe it is bad for generality if challenged before verdict (u).

By 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, sect. 53 (1), 'Sects. 10, 12 and 13 (v), of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102), and sect. 6 (w) of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1863, supra (which relate to prosecutions for bribery and other offences under those Acts), shall extend to any prosecution on indictment for the offence of any corrupt practice within the meaning of this Act, and to any action for any pecuniary forfeiture for an offence under this Act, in like manner as if such offence were bribery within the meaning of those Acts, and such indictment or action were the indictment or action in those sections mentioned, and an order under the said sect. 10 may be made on the defendant, but the Director of Public Prosecutions, or any person instituting any prosecution in his behalf or by direction of an election Court, shall not be deemed to be a private prosecutor nor required under the said sections to give any security.'

(2) 'On any prosecution under this Act, whether on indictment or summarily, and whether before an election Court or otherwise, and in any action for a pecuniary forfeiture, under this Act, the person prosecuted or sued, and the husband or wife of such person, may, if he or she think fit, be examined as an ordinary witness in the case' (w).

(w) Vide post, Bk. xiii. c. v. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, s. 8, empowers election commissioners to summon any person whose evidence they may deem material to the inquiry, and to require any person to produce books, papers, &c., necessary for arriving at the truth of the things to be inquired into by them; and provides that all persons 'shall answer all questions put to them by the commissioners touching the matters to be inquired into by them, and shall produce all books, papers, deeds and writings required of them, and in their custody or under their control, according to the tenor of the summons: provided always that no statement made by any person in answer to any questions put by such commissioners shall, except in cases of indictment for perjury committed in such answers, be admissible in evidence in any proceeding, civil or criminal.' See R. v. Leatham, 30

(3) 'On any such prosecution or action as aforesaid it shall be sufficient to allege that the person charged was guilty of an illegal practice, payment, employment, or hiring within the meaning of this Act, as the case may be, and the certificate of the returning officer at an election, that the election mentioned in the certificate was duly held, and that the person named in the certificate was a candidate at such election, shall be sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated.'

By sect. 52, 'Any person charged with a corrupt practice, may, if the circumstances warrant such finding, be found guilty of an illegal practice (which offence shall for that purpose be an indictable offence), and any person charged with an illegal practice may be found guilty of that offence notwithstanding that the act constituting the offence amounted to a corrupt practice, and a person charged with illegal payment, employment, or hiring may be found guilty of that offence notwithstanding that the act constituting the offence amounted to a corrupt or illegal practice.'

In an action for bribery at an election, the register of voters at an election, made in pursuance of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, ss. 48, 49, was held to be a document of such a public nature as to be admissible upon its mere production by the returning officer, and an examined or certified copy was held admissible (x).

Where a book, which was in writing, and duly signed, contained the register of voters, Byles, J., held, that though there ought to be a copy of the list printed in a book and duly signed, in order to constitute a proper register, yet this register, though irregular, was valid and admissible in evidence (y).

15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, s. 8 (p. 648, note (w)), does not prevent the putting in evidence on an information for bribery a document produced before commissioners, for the proviso to that section applies only to statements made (z).

Trial of Offences.—By 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, s. 43 (subsects. 1–3), provision is made for the attendance of the Director of Public Prosecutions at the trial of election petitions. Sub-sect. 4 provides for the summary trial by the election Court of any person prosecuted by the Director for corrupt or illegal practices, but in the case of a 'corrupt' practice the Court must give the person charged the option of being tried by a jury.

By sub-sect. 5, 'Where a person is so prosecuted for any such offence, and either he elects to be tried by a jury or he does not appear before the Court, or the Court thinks it in the interests of justice expedient that he should be tried before some other Court, the Court, if of opinion that the evidence is sufficient to put the said person upon his trial for the offence, shall order such person to be prosecuted on indictment, or before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction as the case may require for the said offence, and in either case may order him to be prosecuted before such Court as may be named in the order, and for all purposes preliminary and of and incidental to such prosecution the offence shall be deemed to have been committed within the jurisdiction of the Court so named ' (a).

(6) ' Upon such order being made, (a) if the accused person is present before the Court and the offence is an indictable offence, the Court shall commit him to take his trial, or cause him to give bail to appear and take his trial for the said offence.' . . .

(c) ' if the accused person is not present before the Court, the Court shall, as circumstances require, issue a summons for his attendance, or a warrant to apprehend him and bring him before a Court of summary jurisdiction, and that Court, if the offence is an indictable offence (b), shall, on proof only of the summons or warrant and the identity of the accused, commit him to take his trial, or cause him to give bail to appear and take his trial for the said offence ' . . . (c).

Sect. 45 provides for the institution of prosecutions by the Director of Public Prosecutions, and sect. 46 for the removal of any incapacity proved to have been brought about by perjured evidence.

By sect. 50, ' Where an indictment as defined by this Act (vide ante, p. 636), for any offence under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts, or this Act is instituted in the High Court or is removed into the High Court by a writ of certiorari issued at the instance of the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General suggests on the part of the Crown that it is expedient for the purposes of justice that the indictment should be tried in the Central Criminal Court, or if a special jury is ordered, that it should be tried before a judge and jury at the Royal Courts of Justice, the High Court may, if it think fit, order that such indictment shall be so tried upon such terms as the Court may think just, and the High Court may make such orders as appear to the Court necessary or proper for carrying into effect the order for such trial.'

Limitation of Time.—By sect. 51 (1), ' A proceeding against a person in respect of the offence of a corrupt or illegal practice or any other offence under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts or this Act, shall be commenced within one year after the offence was committed, or, if it was committed in reference to an election with respect to which an inquiry is held by election commissioners, shall be commenced within one year after the offence was committed, or within three months after the report of such commissioners is made, whichever period last expires, so that it be commenced within two years after the offence was committed, and the time so limited by this section shall, in the case of any proceeding under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts for any such offence whether before an election Court or otherwise, be substituted for any limitation of time contained in the last mentioned Acts.'

(a) See R. v. Shellard, 23 Q.B.D. 273.
R. v. Ripley, 17 Cox, 120.

(b) See R. v. Shellard, ubi supra.

(c) Provisions identical with this section are made as to municipal elections, 47 & 48 Vict. c. 70, s. 28.

(2) 'For the purposes of this section the issue of a summons, warrant, writ, or other process shall be deemed to be a commencement of a proceeding when the service or execution of the same on or against the alleged offender is prevented by the absconding or concealment or act of the alleged offender, but, save as aforesaid, the service or execution of the same on or against the alleged offender, and not the issue thereof, shall be deemed to be the commencement of the proceeding.'

By sect. 55 (2), 'The enactments relating to charges before justices against persons for indictable offences shall, so far as is consistent with the tenor thereof, apply to every place where an election Court orders a person to be prosecuted on indictment, in like manner as if the Court were a justice of the peace.' (See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42 : 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35.)

By sect. 56 (1), 'Subject to any rules of Court any jurisdiction vested by this Act in the High Court may, so far as it relates to indictments or other criminal proceedings, be exercised by any judge of the King's Bench Division, and in other respects may either be exercised by one of the judges for the time being on the rota for the trial of election petitions, sitting either in Court or at chambers, or may be exercised by a master of the Supreme Court of Judicature in manner directed by and subject to an appeal to the said judges.'

It is, however, provided that a master shall not exercise jurisdiction to grant exceptions or excuses. The Court has power to make rules regulating procedure and practice.

By sect. 57 (1), 'The Director of Public Prosecutions, in performing any duty under this Act, shall act in accordance with the regulations under the Prosecution of Offences Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 22) (d), and subject thereto, in accordance with the directions (if any) given to him by the Attorney-General, and any assistant or representative of the Director of Public Prosecutions in performing any duty under this Act, shall act in accordance with the said regulations and directions, if any, and with the directions given to him by the Director of Public Prosecutions' (e).

Evidence—Certificate of Indemnity.—By sect. 59 (1), 'A person who is called as a witness respecting an election before any election Court shall not be excused from answering any question relating to any offence at or connected with such election on the ground that the answer thereto may criminate or tend to criminate himself, or on the ground of privilege.

Provided that—

(a) A witness who answers truly all questions which he is required by the election Court to answer shall be entitled to receive a certificate of indemnity under the hand of a member of the Court stating that such witness has so answered; and

(b) An answer by a person to a question put by or before any election Court shall not, except in the case of any criminal proceeding for perjury in respect of such evidence (f) be in any proceeding, civil or criminal, admissible in evidence against him.

(d) As amended by the Prosecution of Offences Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 3), post, Vol. ii. p. 1924..

(e) As to costs, see R. v. Law [1900], 1

Q.B. 605, and 8 Edw. VII. c. 15, post, Bk. xii. c. v.

(f) A witness before such a commission of inquiry was, after giving his evidence

(2) Where a person has received such a certificate of indemnity in relation to an election, and any legal proceeding is at any time instituted against him for any offence under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts or this Act, committed by him previously to the date of the certificate, at or in relation to the said election, the Court having cognizance of the case shall, on proof of the certificate, stay the proceeding, and may in their discretion award to the said person such costs as he may have been put to in the proceeding.

(3) Nothing in this section shall be taken to relieve a person receiving a certificate of indemnity from any incapacity under this Act, or from any proceeding to enforce such incapacity (other than a criminal prosecution).

(4) This section shall apply in the case of a witness before any election commissioners in like manner as if the expression "election Court" in this section included election commissioners.

(5) Where a solicitor or person lawfully acting as agent for any party to an election petition respecting any election for a county or borough has not taken any part or been concerned in such election, the election commissioners inquiring into such election shall not be entitled to examine such solicitor or agent respecting matters which came to his knowledge by reason only of his being concerned as solicitor or agent for a party to such petition.'

By sect. 60, 'An election Court or election commissioners, when reporting that certain persons have been guilty of any corrupt or illegal practice, shall report whether those persons have or not been furnished with certificates of indemnity, and such report shall be laid before the Attorney-General (accompanied, in the case of commissioners, with the evidence on which such report was based), with a view to his instituting or directing a prosecution against such persons as have not waived certificates of indemnity, if the evidence should in his opinion be sufficient to support a prosecution.'

Municipal Elections.—By 47 & 48 Vict. c. 70, s. 30, 'Subject to the other provisions of this Act, the procedure for the prosecution of a corrupt or illegal practice, or any illegal payment, employment, or hiring, committed in reference to a municipal election, and the removal of any incapacity incurred by reason of a conviction or report relating to any such offence, and the duties of the Director of Public Prosecutions in relation to any such offence, and all other proceedings in relation thereto (including the grant to a witness of a certificate of indemnity, shall be the same as if such offence had been committed in reference to a parliamentary election; and sects. 45 & 46 and sects. 50–57, both inclusive, and sects.

before it, indicted for perjury committed before a judge, on the trial of an election petition in respect of the same election with reference to which he was examined before the commissioners. Statements made by such witness, in answer to questions put by the commissioners relative to corrupt practices at such election, were given in evidence against him to prove the indictment for perjury. Held, that the exception in the proviso to 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, s. 7, which provided an exception in the case of indictments for perjury as to cases of indictments for perjury, must be considered to mean perjury committed in answer to questions put by the commissioners on the inquiry, and not to perjury generally, and therefore that the above evidence was not admissible. R. v. Buttles, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 248. The words of 46 & 47 Vict. c. 51, s. 59, are 'except in the case of any criminal proceeding for perjury,' and this would seem to destroy the effect of R. v. Slator, 8 Q. B. D. 267.

59 and 60 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 51) (g), shall apply accordingly as if they were re-enacted in this Act, with the necessary modifications, and with the following additions :—

a. Where the Director of Public Prosecutions considers that the circumstances of any case require him to institute a prosecution before any Court other than an election Court, for any offence other than a corrupt practice committed in reference to a municipal election in any borough, he may, by himself or his assistant, institute such prosecution before any Court of summary jurisdiction in the county in which the said borough is situate, or to which it adjoins, and the offence shall be deemed for all purposes to have been committed within the jurisdiction of such Court ;

b. General rules for the purposes of part iv. of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), shall be made by the same authority as rules of Court under the said sections (h) ; and

c. The giving or refusal to give a certificate of indemnity to a witness by the election Court shall be final and conclusive ' (i).

BOOK THE NINTH.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSONS, STATUS AND REPUTATION OF INDIVIDUALS.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF HOMICIDE.

PART I.—MURDER AND FELO DE SE.

SECT. I.—DEFINITION AND PUNISHMENT OF MURDER.

Definition.—Murder (a) is a felony at common law. Its essential elements are not defined by statute except by the provision in sect. 6 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), that ‘ it shall be sufficient in any indictment for murder to charge that the defendant did feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, kill and murder the deceased.’

Murder is the unlawful killing, by any person of sound memory and discretion, of any person under the King’s peace, with malice aforethought (b), either express or implied by law (c). This malice aforethought which distinguishes murder from other species of homicide (d) is not limited to particular illwill against the person slain, but means that the fact has been attended with such circumstances as are the ordinary symptoms of a wicked, depraved, and malignant spirit ; a heart regardless of social duty, and deliberately bent upon mischief (e). Any formed design of doing mischief may be called malice ; and therefore not only killing from premeditated hatred or revenge against the person killed ; but also, in many other cases, killing accompanied with circumstances that shew the heart to be previously wicked, is adjudged to be killing of malice aforethought, and consequently murder (f).

(a) By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 8, every offence which before July 1, 1828, would have amounted to petit treason, shall be deemed to be murder only, and no greater offence ; and all persons guilty in respect thereof, whether as principals or as accessories, shall be dealt with, indicted, tried, and punished as principals and accessories in murder. As to petit treason, see Fost. 323, 327, 336, 376 ; 1 Hawk. c. 32 ; 4 Bl. Com. 203 ; 25 Edw. III. st. 5 ; Pollock & Maitland Hist. Eng. Law, ii. p. 502. The merger of this offence in murder has rendered it unnecessary to repeat the full account of it given in earlier editions of this work. This section was taken from 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 2 (E) ; and 10 Geo. IV. c. 34,

Malice may be either express or implied by law. Express malice is, when one person kills another with a sedate deliberate mind and formed design evidenced by external circumstances, which disclose the inward intention; as lying in wait, antecedent menaces, former grudges, and concerted schemes to do the deceased some bodily harm (g). And malice is implied by law from any deliberate cruel act committed by one person against another, however sudden (h). Thus where a man kills another suddenly without any, or without considerable provocation, the law implies malice; considering that no person, unless of an abandoned heart, would be guilty of such an act upon a slight or no apparent cause (i). So if a man wilfully poisons another the law presumes malice, though no particular enmity can be proved (j). And in cases of killing by a wilful act of such nature as shews the person by whom it is committed to be an enemy to all mankind, the law will infer a general malice from such depraved inclination to mischief (k). As a general rule, all homicide

(k) 1 Hale, 455. 1 Hawk. c. 29, s. 12. 4 Bl. Com. 200. 1 East, P. C. 231. Malitia, in its proper or legal sense, is different from that sense which it bears in common speech. In common acceptation it signifies a desire of revenge, or a settled anger against a particular person: but this is not the legal sense; and Holt, C.J., says: 'Some have been led into mistake by not well considering what the passion of malice is; they have construed it to be a rancour of mind lodged in the person killing for some considerable time before the commission of the fact, which is a mistake, arising from the not well distinguishing between hatred and malice. Envy, hatred and malice are three distinct passions of the mind.' Kel. (J) 126. In the Roman law, malitia appears to have imported a mixture of fraud, and of that which is opposite to simplicity and honesty. Cicero speaks of it (De Nat. Deor. Lib. 3, s. 30) as 'versuta et fallax nocendi ratio'; and in another work (De Offic. Lib. 3, s. 18) he says, 'mihī quidem etiam verā hæreditates non honestæ videntur, si sint malitiosis (i.e. according to Pearce, a malo animo profectis) blanditiis officiorum, non veritate sed simulatione, quæsitæ.' And see Dig. Lib. 2, Tit. 13, Lex 8, where, in speaking of a banker, or cashier giving his accounts, it is said, 'Ubi exigitur argentarius rationes edere, tunc puniuntur cum dolo malo non exhibet . . . Dolo malo autem non edidit, et qui malitiose edidit et qui in totum non edidit.' Amongst us malice is a term of law importing directly wickedness, and excluding a just cause or excuse. Thus Coke, in his comment on the words per malitiam, says, 'If one be appealed of murder, and it is found by verdict that he killed the party se defendendo, this shall not be said to be per malitiam, because he had a just cause.' 2 Co. Inst. 384. And where the statutes speak of a prisoner on his arraignment standing mute of malice, the word clearly cannot be understood in its common acceptation of anger or desire of revenge against another. Thus where 25 Hen. VIII. c. 3, says, that persons arraigned of petit treason, &c., standing 'mute of malice or froward mind,' or challenging, &c., shall be excluded from clergy, the word malice, explained by the accompanying words, seems to signify a wickedness or frowardness of mind in refusing to submit to the course of justice; in opposition to cases where some just cause may be assigned for the silence, as that it proceeds from madness, or some other disability or distemper. And in the statute 21 Edw. I., De malefactoribus in parcis, trespassers are mentioned who shall not yield themselves to the foresters, &c., but 'immo malitiam suam proseguendo et continuando,' shall fly or stand upon their defence. And where the question of malice has arisen in cases of homicide, the matter for consideration has been (as will be seen in the course of the present and subsequent chapters) whether the act were done with or without just cause or excuse; so that it has been suggested (Chapple, J., MS. Sum.) that what is usually called malice implied by the law would perhaps be expressed more intelligibly and familiarly to the understanding if it were called malice in a legal sense. Malice, 'in its legal sense, denotes a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse.' M'Pherson v. Daniels, 10 B. & C. 272, Littledale, J., and approved in R. v. Noon, 6 Cox, 137, by Cresswell, J., as the more intelligible expression. 'We must settle what is meant by the term malice. The legal import of this term differs from its acceptation in common conversation. It is not, as in ordinary speech, only an expression of hatred and ill-will to an individual, but means any wicked or mischievous intention is presumed to be malicious, and murder, until the contrary appears, from circumstances of alleviation, excuse, or justification (l); and it is incumbent upon the prisoner to make out such circumstances to the satisfaction of the Court and jury, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him (m). A defence grounded upon violent provocation will not avail, however grievous the provocation, if there was an interval of reflection, or a reasonable time for the blood to cool before the deadly purpose was effected. And provocation is no answer if express malice be proved. Thus if a man, having received provocation, deliberately and advisedly threatens vengeance against the other, as by declaring that he will have his blood, or the like, and afterwards carries his design into execution, he is guilty of murder; although the killing followed so soon after the provocation that the law might, apart from evidence of such express malice, have imputed the act to unadvised passion (n). But where fresh provocation intervenes between preconceived malice and the death, it ought clearly to appear that the killing was upon the antecedent malice; for if there is an old quarrel between A. and B., and they are reconciled again, and then, upon a new and sudden falling out, A. kills B., this is not murder (o). But if it appears that the reconciliation was but pretended or counterfeit, and that the hurt done was upon the score of the old malice, then such killing will be murder (p).

Where knowledge of some fact is necessary to make a killing murder, and several persons are concerned in the killing, those who have the knowledge will be guilty of murder, and those who have it not of manslaughter only. Thus if A. assaults B. of malice, and they fight, and A.'s of the mind. Thus in the crime of murder, which is always stated in the indictment to be committed with malice aforethought, it is neither necessary in support of such indictment to shew that the prisoner had any enmity to the deceased, nor would proof of absence of ill-will furnish the accused with any defence, when it is proved that the act of killing was intentional, and done without any justifiable cause.' R. v. Harvey, 2 B. & C. 268, Best, J. Malice does not mean the same thing in criminal as in civil cases. In criminal cases motive is usually an essential ingredient in the definition of an offence or in determining the appropriate punishment, whereas in civil cases the law is more concerned with the fact of an injury than with the motive for causing it. Quinn v. Leatham [1901], A. C. 495. In criminal cases, except of defamation, malice usually denotes intention, deliberation, or wantonness as distinguished from negligence or inadvertence. See R. v. Senior [1899], 1 Q.B. 283, and R. v. Ellwood, 1 Cr. App. R. 181.

(l) 4 Bl. Com. 201. In R. v. Greenacre, 8 C. & P. 35, Tindal, C.J., said, 'where it appears that one person's death has been occasioned by the hand of another, it behoves that other to shew from evidence, or by inference from the circumstances of the case, that the offence is of a mitigated character, or does not amount to the crime of murder.' Coleridge and Coltman, JJ., presentibus.

On an indictment for murder it appeared that the deceased died of a wound inflicted in her chest with a knife; there was no evidence of any dispute; the prisoner asserted that she had killed herself, and this was his defence. The jury found the prisoner guilty, 'but we believe it was done without premeditation.' Byles, J., refused to receive this verdict, and told the jury that 'to reduce the crime to manslaughter, it must be shewn that there was provocation at the time, and provocation of a serious nature. The prosecutor is not bound to prove that the homicide was committed from malice prepense. If the homicide be proved, the law presumes malice; and although that may be rebutted by evidence, no such attempt has been made here. The defence is that the woman took her own life. The question for you is, did the prisoner take his wife's life or not? If he did, it was murder.' R. v. Maloney, 9 Cox, 6. See R. v. Fairbrother, 1 Cr. App. R. 233.

Judgment and Execution.—By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, sect. 1. 'Whosoever shall be convicted of murder shall suffer death as a felon' (r). This has been modified by the Children Act, 1908, as to murder by persons under 16 (s).

Sect. 2. Upon every conviction for murder the Court shall pronounce sentence of death, and the same may be carried into execution, and all other proceedings upon such sentence and in respect thereof may be had and taken, in the same manner in all respects as sentence of death might have been pronounced and carried into execution, and all other proceedings thereupon and in respect thereof might have been had and taken, before the passing of this Act (6 Aug., 1861,) upon a conviction for any other felony for which the prisoner might have been sentenced to suffer death as a felon' (t).

By the Capital Punishment Amendment Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 24) (u), s. 2, judgment of death to be executed on any prisoner sentenced on any indictment or inquisition for murder, shall be carried into effect within the walls of the prison in which the offender is confined at the time of execution. The Act directs that certain persons shall be present at the execution, &c.

By the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), s. 13 (1), 'Where judgment of death has been passed upon a convict at any Court of assize or any sessions of oyer and terminer or gaol delivery held for any county or riding or division or other part of a county (v), the sheriff of such county shall be charged with the execution of such judgment, and may carry such judgment into execution in any prison which is the common gaol of his county or in which the convict was confined for the purpose of safe custody prior to his removal to the place where such Court was held, and shall, for the purpose of such execution, have the same jurisdiction and powers over and in the prison in which the judgment is to be carried into execution, whether such prison is or is not situate within his county, and over the officers of such prison, as he has by law over and in the common gaol of his county and the officers thereof, or would have had if the Prison Act, 1865, and the Prison Act, 1877 (w), had not passed, and shall be subject to the same responsibility and duties as if the said Acts had not passed.

(2) This section shall be in addition to and not in derogation of any power authorised to be exercised by order in Council under the Winter Assizes Act, 1876 (x), and the Spring Assizes Act, 1879 (y) or either of them, and of the provisions of the Central Criminal Court (Prisons) Act, 1881 (z).

In the case of prisoners sentenced to death for murder at the winter or spring assizes, the sentence may be executed in any prison in which the prisoner was confined for safe custody before his removal to the place where the assizes were held at which he was convicted. Sentences of death for murder at the Central Criminal Court are executed at the prison ordered by the judge or if no order is made, at the prison in which the prisoner is confined (a).

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 3, 'The body of every person executed for murder shall be buried within the precincts of the prison in which he shall have been last confined after conviction, and the sentence of the Court shall so direct' (b).

By 31 & 32 Vict. c. 24, s. 6, 'The body of every offender executed shall be buried within the walls of the prison within which judgment of death is executed on him, provided that if one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State is satisfied on the representation of the visiting justices of a prison that there is not convenient space within the walls thereof for the burial of offenders executed therein, he may, by writing under his hand, appoint some other fit place for that purpose, and the same shall be used accordingly (c).

By sect. 15, 'The omission to comply with the provisions of this Act shall not make the execution of the judgment of death illegal in any case in which such execution would otherwise have been legal.'

By sect. 5, 'The coroner of the jurisdiction to which the prison belongs wherein judgment of death is executed on any offender shall within twenty-four hours after the execution hold an inquest on the body of the offender and the jury at the inquest shall inquire into and ascertain the identity of the body and whether judgment of death was duly executed on the offender. . . .

Execution under Sentence of the High Court.—On the removal by certiorari after conviction of an indictment for murder committed in Pembrokeshire and tried in Herefordshire, the Court of King's Bench, after overruling certain exceptions to the indictment and conviction, held that the prisoner might be sentenced in the Court of King's Bench and executed by the marshal at Kennington (d).

In this case it seems to have been ruled that the Attorney-General as of right could obtain a habeas corpus and certiorari to remove into the King's Bench a conviction and judgment at the assizes for murder and the bodies of the prisoners. The prisoners were also given three days to shew cause why execution should not be awarded. One prisoner pleaded ore tenus (as he might, R. v. Dean, 1 Leach, 476) that he was not the actual murderer, and was entitled to a pardon for giving information, in accordance with a proclamation in the Gazette.

of the constable of Chester Castle in that castle which was within the ambit of the city, but was part of the county of Chester. A question arose, whether, since the passing of the Law Terms Act, 1830 (f), the sheriffs of the city or the sheriffs of the county were bound to execute the sentence (g); and both parties refusing to do it, the prisoners had been from time to time respited. The Attorney-General moved for a certiorari to remove the record of the conviction and the judgment, and for a habeas corpus to bring up the prisoners, in order that execution might be awarded by the King's Bench, and said he considered himself entitled to the writs as of right: but from respect to the Court, and for his own justification in the course he adopted, he stated the grounds of his application, and cited many cases to shew that he was entitled to the writs as of course, and that the Court of King's Bench might direct execution to be done by the sheriff of the county of Chester, or the sheriffs of the city, by the sheriff of Middlesex, or by the marshal of the King's Bench; and the writs were forthwith granted by the Court.

The Court refused to hear an application by the sheriff of Middlesex that he should not be ordered to execute the prisoners, but ultimately awarded execution to be done by the marshal of the Marshalsea, assisted by the sheriff of Surrey (h).

SECT. II.—FELONY DE SE.

Self-murder has been regarded as a peculiar instance of malice directed to the destruction of a man's own life, by inducing him deliberately to put an end to his existence, or to commit some unlawful malicious act, the consequence of which is his own death (i). If one man persuades another to kill himself, the adviser is guilty of murder (j). A man who kills another, upon his desire or command, is in the judgment of law as much a murderer as if he had done the killing out of his own head (k). It is said that in such a case the person killed is not looked upon as a felo de se, inasmuch as his assent, being against the laws of God and man, is void (l). But where two persons agree to die together, and one of them at the persuasion of the other, buys poison and mixes it, and both drink of it, and he who bought and made the potion survives by using proper remedies and the other dies; it is said to be the better opinion, that he who dies shall be adjudged a felo de se, because all that happened was originally (g) By the Chester Courts Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 36), s. 4, the sheriff of the county of Chester is charged with, and is to carry into effect within the county all sentences of death passed at any assizes for the said county, any statute, law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding. Previous provision had been made in 1835 by 5 & 6 Will. IV., repealed in 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 35).

(j) If present when the other kills himself. If absent, he is accessory before the fact. R. v. Russell, 1 Mood. 356. By a Bill introduced into Parliament in 1908, it was proposed to make persons accessory before the fact to, or aiders and abettors in, suicide not guilty of murder but punishable for a distinct offence.

owing to his own wicked purpose, and the other only put it in his power to execute it in that particular manner (m). If a man, attempting to kill another, misses his blow and kills himself (n), or intending to shoot at another, mortally wounds himself by the bursting of the gun (o), he is considered to be felo de se; his own death being the consequence of an unlawful malicious act towards another. It has also been said that if A. strikes B. to the ground, and B. draws a knife and holds it up in his own defence, and A. in haste falling upon B. to kill him, falls upon the knife, and be thereby killed, A. is felo de se (p); but this has been doubted (q).

A husband and wife being in extreme poverty and great distress of mind, the husband said, 'I am weary of my life, and will destroy myself,' upon which the wife replied, 'Then I will die with you.' The man prayed the wife to go and buy ratsbane and they would drink it together. She did so and mixed it with some drink, and they both partook of it. The husband died, but the wife, by drinking salad oil, which caused sickness, recovered, and was tried for the murder of her husband (r), and acquitted, but solely on the ground that, being the wife of the deceased, she was under his control; and inasmuch as the proposal to commit suicide had been first suggested by him, it was considered that she was not a free agent, and therefore the jury, under the direction of the judge who tried the case, pronounced her not guilty (s).

The prisoner was indicted for the murder of a woman by drowning her. The prisoner and the deceased had cohabited for several months and she was pregnant by him. They were in a state of extreme distress, and had no place of shelter. They went to Westminster Bridge to drown themselves in the Thames. They got into a boat, talked together for some time, the prisoner standing with his foot on the edge of the boat, and the woman leaning upon him. The prisoner then found himself in the water; but whether by actually throwing himself in, or by accident, did not appear. He struggled to get back into the boat again, and then found that the woman was gone; he then endeavoured to save her, but could not get to her, and she was drowned. In his statement before the magistrate he said that he intended to drown himself, but dissuaded the woman from following his example. Best, J., told the jury, that if they believed the prisoner only intended to drown himself, and not that the woman should die with him, they should acquit the prisoner; but that if both went to the water for the purpose of drowning themselves together, each encouraged the other in the commission of a felonious act, and the survivor was guilty of murder. He also told the jury, that although the indictment charged the prisoner with throwing the deceased into the water, yet if he were present at the time she threw herself in, and consented to her doing it, the act of throwing was to be considered as the act of both, and so the case was reached by the indictment. The jury stated that they were of opinion that both the prisoner and the deceased went to the water for the purpose of drowning themselves, and the prisoner was convicted. And, upon a case reserved, the judges were clear that if the deceased threw herself into the water by the encouragement of the prisoner, and because she thought he had set her the example in pursuance of their previous agreement, he was a principal in the second degree, and was guilty of murder; but as it was doubtful whether the deceased did not fall in by accident, it was not murder in either of them, and the prisoner was recommended for a pardon (t). So where upon an indictment for the murder of a woman, it appeared that the prisoner and the deceased, who passed as husband and wife, being in very great distress, both agreed to take poison, and each took a quantity of laudanum, in the presence of the other, and both lay down on the same bed together, wishing to die in each other's arms, and the woman died, but the prisoner recovered; Patteson, J., told the jury that, 'supposing the parties in this case mutually agreed to commit suicide, and one only accomplished that object, the survivor will be guilty of murder in point of law' (u).

(q) Hale (1 P. C. 413) considers that B. is not guilty at all of the death of A., not even se defendendo, as he did not strike, only held up the knife; and that A. is not felo de se, but that it is homicide by misadventure. In 1 Hawk. c. 27, s. 5, it seems to be considered that B. should be adjudged to have killed A. se defendendo.

(r) Anon. [1604] Moore (K.B.) 754; 72 E. R. 884. The report begins, 'en home et se feme ayant long temps vive incontinent ensemble,' and states that a special verdict was found, but does not state the decision. In former editions a doubt was expressed whether the two were husband and wife, based on a mistranslation of the word 'incontinent.'

(s) The report in Moore does not state any acquittal. The rest of this passage is taken from the statement of the case in R. v. Alison, 8 C. & P. 418, Patteson, J.

A person could not formerly be tried as an accessory before the fact, for inciting another to commit felo de se, if that person committed felo de se (v). But 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 1 (w), removes this difficulty, as it abolishes for practical purposes the distinction between principals in the first and second degree and accessories (x).

An attempt to commit felo de se is not an attempt to commit murder within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 15 (post, p. 841), but is a misdemeanor at common law (y). The question for the jury is whether the defendant had a mind capable of contemplating the act, and whether in fact he did intend to take his own life, and drunkenness, while in this as in other cases no excuse, is a material factor to determine whether the defendant really meant to kill himself (z).

SECT. III.—THE PARTY KILLING, AND THE PARTY KILLED.

The Party Killing.—The person committing a crime must be a free agent, and not subject to actual force at the time the act is done. Thus if A. by force takes the arm of B., in which is a weapon, and therewith kills C., A. is guilty of murder, but B. is not. But the use of moral force is no legal excuse, e.g. by threats of duress or imprisonment to B., or even assault to the peril of B.'s life, in order to compel him to kill C. (a). If A. procures B., an idiot or lunatic, to kill C., A. is guilty of the murder as principal, and B. is merely an instrument (b). So if A. lays a trap or pitfall for B., whereby B. is killed, A. is guilty of murder, the trap or pitfall being only the instrument of death (e).

If a person takes poison himself, not knowing it to be poison at the persuasion of another who knows it is poison, the latter is a principal in the first degree in murder though not present at the taking (d).

A girl of thirteen was indicted for the murder of an infant ten weeks old. It was argued that it was not proved that the girl had capacity to commit the crime, or had acted with deliberate malice. Pollock, C. B., said, 'The crimes of murder and manslaughter are, in some instances, very difficult of distinction. The distinction which seems most reasonable consists in the consciousness that the act done was one which would be likely to cause death. No one could commit murder without that consciousness. The jury must be satisfied before they could find the prisoner guilty [of murder] that she was conscious, and that her act was deliberate. They must be satisfied that she had arrived at that maturity of intellect which was a necessary condition of the crime charged' (e).

The Party Killed.—Murder may be committed upon any person within the King's peace. Therefore, to kill an alien enemy within the realm except in the actual exercise of war (f), is as much murder as to kill a born Englishman (g).

An infant in its mother's womb, not being in rerum natura, is not considered as a person who can be killed within the description of murder; and if a woman being quick or great with child, takes any potion to cause an abortion, or if another gives her any such potion, or if a person strikes her, whereby the child within her is killed, it is not murder or manslaughter (h), but is punishable under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 58, post, p. 829 (i).

Where a child, born alive, afterwards dies by reason of potions or bruises received in the womb, those who administered the potion or caused the bruise seem to be guilty of murder (i). On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner, who practised midwifery, was called in to attend a woman in labour, and when the head of the child became visible, the prisoner, being grossly ignorant of the art which he professed, and unable to deliver the woman with safety to herself and the child (as might have been done by a person of ordinary skill), broke and compressed the skull of the infant, and thereby occasioned its death immediately after it was born. It was argued that the child being en ventre sa mere at the time the wound was given, the prisoner could not be guilty of manslaughter; but, upon a case reserved, a conviction of manslaughter was held right (j).

Upon an indictment against a woman for the murder of her child, Maule, J., told the jury that if a person intending to procure abortion does an act which causes a child to be born alive so much earlier than the natural time that it is born in a state much less capable of living, and afterwards dies in consequence of its exposure to the external world, the person who by her misconduct so brings the child into the world, and puts it thereby into a situation in which it cannot live, is guilty of murder (k).

To be the subject of murder, a child must be actually born. On an indictment against a mother for the murder of her child, Littledale, J., told the jury, 'the being born must mean that the whole body is brought into the world, and it is not sufficient that the child respire in the progress of the birth' (l). Upon an indictment containing a count for murder by stabbing, and a count charging that before the child was completely born the prisoner stabbed it with a fork, and that it was born, and then died of the stab, it was proved that a puncture was found on the child's skull, but when that injury was inflicted did not appear, and some questions were asked as to whether the child had breathed. Parke, J., said, 'The child might breathe before it was born; but its having breathed is not sufficiently life to make the killing of the child murder; there must have been an independent circulation in the child, or the child cannot be considered as alive for this purpose (m).

One count charged that the prisoner, being pregnant with a female child, 'did bring forth the same alive,' and then charged the murder of the child by choking it with a handkerchief; and another count charged the murder in the same way of a certain illegitimate child, 'then lately before born of the body' of M. T. There was strong evidence to prove that the child had been wholly produced alive from the prisoner's body, and that she had strangled it; but it was also clearly proved by the surgeon, who examined the body of the child, that it must have been strangled before it had been separated from the mother by the severance of the umbilical cord, and the surgeon further stated that a child has, after breathing fully, an independent circulation of its own, even while still attached to the mother by the umbilical cord, and that in his judgment the child in question had breathed fully after it had been wholly produced, and had therefore an independent circulation of its own, before and at the time it was strangled, and was then in a state to carry on a separate existence. Erskine, J., directed the jury, that if they were satisfied that the child had been wholly produced from the body of the prisoner alive, and that the prisoner wilfully strangled the child after it had been so produced and while it was alive, and while it had, according to the evidence of the surgeon, an independent circulation of its own, he was of opinion that the charge in the said counts was made out, although the child, at the time it was so strangled, still remained attached to the mother by the navel-string. Upon a case reserved, a conviction of murder was held right (n). But if a child is actually wholly produced alive it is not necessary that it should have breathed to make it the subject of murder (o). By a bill introduced in the session of 1909 it is proposed to make it felony to destroy an infant during birth under circumstances which would have made the act murder if the child were fully born (p).

SECT. IV.—OF THE MEANS OF KILLING; AND OF CAUSING DEATH BY MALICIOUS AND INTENTIONAL NEGLECT OF DUTY (q).

The killing may be effected by poisoning (r), striking, starving, drowning, and a thousand other forms of death, by which human nature may be overcome (s). It has been generally considered that there must be some actual corporal damage to the party; and that where a person, either by working upon the fancy of another, or by harsh and unkind usage, puts him into such passion of grief or fear that he dies suddenly, or contracts some disease which causes his death, such killing is not murder (t). But on principle there seems no reason for holding that deliberate frightening to death is not at least manslaughter (u), and if a man does an act, the probable consequence of which may be, and eventually is, death, such killing may be murder; although no blow is struck by himself, and no killing may have been primarily intended (v): as where a person carried his sick father, against his will, in a severe season, from one town to another, by reason whereof he died (w); or where a harlot being delivered of a child, left it covered only with leaves in an orchard, where it was killed by a kite (x); or where a child was placed in a hogsty, where it was eaten (y). In these cases, and also where a child was shifted by parish officers from parish to parish, till it died from want of care and sustenance, it was considered that the acts so done, wilfully and deliberately, were evidence of malice aforethought (z).

Towers*, 12 Cox, 530, an indictment for manslaughter of an infant, it appeared that the prisoner had assaulted a woman carrying the infant, and had so frightened the infant that it died in about six weeks. Denman, J., held that frightening a child to death would be manslaughter, but apparently considered that this would not be so as to an adult. He left it to the jury to say whether the assault on the woman was the direct cause of the death of the infant. The prisoner was acquitted. See R. v. Evans, post, p. 666n.

In R. v. Evans (a) the indictment charged that the prisoner killed his wife (1) by beating; (2) by throwing her out of the window; and (3 and 4) that he beat her and threatened to throw her out of the window and to murder her; and that by such threats she was so terrified that, through fear of his putting his threats into execution, she threw herself out of the window, and of the beating and the bruises received by the fall died. There was strong evidence that the death of the wife was occasioned by the blows she received before her fall: but Heath, Gibbs, and Bayley, JJ., were of opinion that if her death was occasioned partly by the blows and partly by the fall, yet if she was constrained by her husband's threats of further violence, and from a well-grounded apprehension of his doing such further violence as would endanger her life, he was answerable for the consequences of the fall, as much as if he had thrown her out of the window himself. The prisoner however was acquitted; the jury being of opinion that the deceased threw herself out of the window from her own intemperance, and not under the influence of the threats (b).

In R. v. Curley (bb), the prisoner and the deceased woman were in a small flat together; quarrelling was heard to take place, and the deceased was heard to call for help from the window of the back room. She fell out of the window and was killed: Phillimore, J., directed the jury (inter alia): 'If fearing or reasonably fearing violence or further violence from this man she went to the window to call for assistance . . . if she without any intention of jumping out overbalanced and fell then the man would be responsible, but that would be manslaughter. A conviction on this direction was affirmed on appeal.

Upon a trial for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner and the deceased had some dispute, and the deceased's boat being alongside the schooner in which the prisoner was, the prisoner pushed it with his foot, and the deceased stretched out over the bow of the boat to lay hold of a barge, to prevent the boat drifting away, and losing his balance fell

Where an indictment for manslaughter alleged that the deceased was riding on horseback, and that the prisoner assaulted and struck him with a stick, and that the deceased, from a well-grounded apprehension of a further attack, which would have endangered his life, spurred his horse, whereby it became frightened, and threw the deceased, &c., and it was proved that the prisoner struck the deceased with a small stick, and that he rode away, the prisoner riding after him, and on the deceased spurring his horse it winced and threw him: it was held, on the authority of the above case, that the case was proved. R. v. Hickman, 5 C. & P. 151, Park, J. See R. v. Grimes, 15 N. S. W. (b) In R. v. Donovan, 4 Cox, 399, on an indictment for causing a bodily injury dangerous to life by casting the prosecutrix out of a window upon the ground, she stated that she fell out of the window accidentally; that the prisoner beat her with his fists, and was about to inflict other injuries upon her, when she went to the window to call for assistance, and fell out of it on to the ground. In opening the case, it was stated that the evidence would be conflicting, whether the prosecutrix was thrown or jumped out of the window, but that it would be immaterial, for if the prisoner, by his violence, compelled her to throw herself out, he would be guilty. Alderson, B., said, 'I do not think it will be sufficient to prove that she jumped from the window to escape from his violence. You must go further than that, and satisfy the jury that he intended at the time to make her jump out.' See the cases in note (a).

overboard, and was drowned. Park, J., after consulting Patteson, J., said, that they were of opinion that, if the case had rested on this evidence, it would not have amounted to manslaughter (c). Upon an indictment for murder by drowning, by the deceased slipping into the water in endeavouring to escape from an assault made with intent to murder or rob, it was proved that the body was found in the river, and it bore marks of violence, but not sufficient to occasion death, which appeared to have been caused by drowning, and there were marks of a struggle on the banks of the river. Erskine, J., told the jury that a man might throw himself into a river under such circumstances as rendered it not a voluntary act, by reason of force applied either to the body or the mind; and it then became the guilty act of him who compelled the deceased to take the step, but the apprehension must be of immediate violence, and well grounded from the circumstances by which the deceased was surrounded; and that the jury must be satisfied not that there was no other way of escape, but that it was such a step as a reasonable man might take (d).

By Neglect of Duty.—The prisoner had delivered herself of a child by night upon a road, and had left it on the side of the road without any clothing or covering to protect it from the inclemency of the weather, where it died from the cold, and she had wholly concealed the birth of the child till she was apprehended. Coltman, J., told the jury, ‘If a party so conduct himself with regard to a human being, which is helpless and unable to provide for itself, as must necessarily lead to its death, the crime amounts to murder. But if the circumstances are not such that he must have been aware that the result would be death, the crime would be manslaughter, provided the death were caused by an unlawful act, but not such as to imply a malicious mind. There have been cases where it has been held that persons leaving a child exposed, and without any assistance, and under circumstances where no assistance was likely to be rendered, were guilty of murder. It will be for you to consider whether the prisoner left the child in such a situation that to all reasonable apprehension she must have been aware that the child must die, or whether there were circumstances that would raise a reasonable expectation that the child would be found by some one else, and preserved; because then it would only be the crime of manslaughter. If a person were to leave a child at the door of a gentleman, the probability would be so great that it would be found, that it would be too much to say that it was murder, if it died; if, on the other hand, a child were left in an unfrequented place, what inference could be drawn but that the party left it there in order that it might die? This is a sort of intermediate case, and therefore it is for you to say whether the prisoner had reasonable ground for believing that the child would be found and preserved (e).

The point in this case was, that it was consistent with all that was stated in the count that the child might be capable of taking care of itself; but it was held that if she had been sufficiently old, or strong enough so to do, the death could not have arisen from the

A man and his wife were indicted for the murder of a boy who was bound as a parish apprentice to the man. Both the prisoners had used the apprentice in a most cruel and barbarous manner, and had not provided him with sufficient food and nourishment: but the surgeon who opened the body deposed that in his judgment the boy died from debility, and for want of proper food and nourishment, and not from the wounds, &c., which he had received. Lawrence, J., considered the case defective as to the wife, as it was not her duty to provide the apprentice with sufficient food and nourishment, she being the servant of her husband, and so directed the jury, who acquitted her; but the husband was found guilty and executed (f).

The prisoner, upon his apprentice, who had been sent to Bridewell for misbehaviour, returning to him in a lousy and distempered condition, did not take such care of him as his condition required, and which he might have done; the apprentice not having been suffered to lie in a bed, on account of the vermin, but being made to lie on the boards for some time without covering, and without common medical care. The medical witnesses were of opinion that the boy's death was most probably occasioned by his ill-treatment in Bridewell, and the want of care when he went home; and inclined to think, that if he had been properly treated when he came home, he might have recovered. But, though some harsh expressions were proved to have been spoken by the prisoner to the boy, yet there was no evidence of any personal violence having being used by the prisoner; and it was proved that the apprentice had had sufficient sustenance; and the prisoner had a general good character for treating his apprentices with humanity, and had made application to get this boy into the hospital. Under these circumstances, the Recorder left it to the jury to consider whether the death of the boy was occasioned by the ill-treatment he received from his master, after returning from Bridewell, and whether that ill-treatment amounted to evidence of malice, in which case they were to find him guilty of murder. At the same time they were told, with the concurrence of Gould, J., and Hotham, B., that if they thought otherwise, yet, as it appeared that the prisoner's conduct towards his apprentice was highly blamable and act of the prisoner, and therefore the defect was cured by the verdict. It is a novel doctrine in criminal cases that a defective indictment is cured by verdict. Hale says (2 P. C. 193), 'None of the statutes of jeofails extend to indictments, and therefore a defective indictment is not aided by verdict, and no authority is known for such a doctrine in other cases' (but vide post Bk. xii. c. ii.). The indictment was right; for it alleged the acts of the prisoner which caused the death, and that is all that it ever was necessary to do in such an indictment. C. S. G.

(f) R. v. Squire, Stafford Lent Assizes, 1799, MS. After the surgeon had deposed that the boy died from debility, and for want of proper food and nourishment, and not from the wounds, &c., which he had received, the learned judge was proceeding to inquire of him whether, in his judgment, the series of cruel usage the boy had received, and in which the wife had been as active as her husband, might not have so far broken his constitution as to promote the debility, and co-operate along with the want of proper food and nourishment to bring on his death, when the surgeon was seized with a fainting fit, and, being taken out of court, did not recover sufficiently to attend again upon the trial. The judge, after observing that, upon the evidence, as it then stood, he could not leave it to the jury to consider, whether the wounds, &c., inflicted on the boy, had contributed to cause his death, said, that if any physician or surgeon were present who had heard the trial, he might be examined as to the point intended to be inquired into; but no such person being present, he delivered his opinion to the jury, as stated in the text.

improper, they might, under all these circumstances, find him guilty of manslaughter ; which they accordingly did (g). And upon the question being afterwards put to the judges, whether the verdict were well found, they all agreed that the prisoner should be burned in the hand and discharged (h).

On an indictment for the manslaughter of an apprentice by neglecting to provide him sufficient meat and drink, &c., it appeared that the deceased was bound to the prisoner by indenture, by which he covenanted to find him clothes and victuals ; and, according to the evidence of some medical men, that his death was produced by uncleanness and want of food. Patteson, J., told the jury that, ' by the general law the master was not bound to provide medical advice for his servant (i) ; yet that the case was different with respect to an apprentice, and that a master was bound during the illness of his apprentice to provide him with proper medicines ; and that if they thought that the death of the deceased was occasioned, not by the want of food, &c., but by want of medicines, then, in the absence of any charge to that effect in the indictment, the prisoner would be entitled to be acquitted ' (j). An indictment for manslaughter alleged in one count that the deceased was the apprentice of the prisoner, and that it was his duty to provide sufficient food for her as such apprentice, and that he neglected to do so, &c., by means of which she died ; and (in another count) that the deceased was the servant of the prisoner, and that it was his duty to provide her with food, &c.. An invalid indenture of apprenticeship was put in, and it appeared that the deceased had always been treated as an apprentice by the prisoner, and had performed such duties as an apprentice would have performed, but the prisoner being a farmer these duties were the same as those performed by ordinary farmer's servants. It was objected that the first count was not proved, as the indenture was invalid ; and that the relation of master and servant never existed, for an invalid contract of apprenticeship could not be converted into a hiring and service ; that the foundation of this indictment was that the prisoner was legally bound to provide maintenance for the deceased, and here it was clear he could neither have been compelled to support her as an apprentice or as a servant. Patteson, J., held, that the prisoner, having treated the deceased as his servant, could not turn round and say she was not his servant at all (k). Where the first count stated that the deceased certainly cannot be drawn from this statement of the case. The same opinion, however, is stated in the Old-Bailey Sessions Papers, to have been thrown out by the Recorder in Wade's case.'

was the apprentice of the prisoner, and it was his duty to provide the deceased with proper and necessary nourishment, medicine, medical care and attention, and charged the death to be from neglect, &c. ; and the second count that charged the deceased 'so being such apprentice as aforesaid,' was killed by the prisoner by over-work and beating ; and the only evidence given to shew that the deceased was an apprentice was that the prisoner had stated that he was his apprentice ; Patteson, J., held that there was sufficient evidence to support the second count, but not the first (l).

If a mistress culpably neglects to supply proper food and lodging to her servant, when the servant is so enfeebled in body or mind as to be helpless and unable to take care of herself, or is so under the dominion and restraint of the mistress as to be unable to withdraw herself from her control ; and the death of the servant is caused or accelerated by such neglect, the mistress is liable to be convicted of manslaughter (m).

In R. v. Saunders (n), a married woman was charged with the murder of her illegitimate child, aged three years, by omitting to give it proper food. The prisoner had married J. S. ; the deceased was her illegitimate child, born before the marriage. In the judgment of medical witnesses the death had proceeded from the want of proper food. For the prosecution reference was made to R. v. Squire (o), and to sect. 71 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834 (4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 76) ; and it was submitted that the mother of an illegitimate child was bound to take care of her child, and might be guilty of murder if its death arose from neglect. Alderson, B., said, 'The prisoner is indicted as a married woman : if her husband supplied her with food for this child, and she wilfully neglected to give it to the child, and thereby caused its death, it might be murder in her (o). In these cases the wife is in the nature of the servant of the husband : it does not at all turn upon the natural relation of mother : to charge her you must shew that the husband supplied her with food to give to the child, and that she wilfully neglected to give it. There is no distinction between the case of an apprentice and that of a bastard child, and the wife is only the servant of the husband, and, according to the case before Lawrence, J., (p), can only be made criminally responsible by omitting to deliver the food to the child, with which she had been father or mother, or was maintained by them, or did any necessary service for them, though he did not receive wages, he might have been indicted by the description of servant. 1 Hawk. c. 32, s. 2. 1 East, P. C. 336 ; and a near relation, as a sister, might be a servant within the statute, if she acted as such. R. v. Edwards, Stafford Assizes. MS. coram Lawrence, J. C. S. G.

(m) R. v. Smith, 34 L. J. M. C. 153, Erle, C.J., said : 'It is undisputed law that if a person who has the custody of another who is helpless, leaves that other with insufficient food, and so causes his death, he is criminally responsible. But it is also clear that if a person having the exercise of free will, chooses to stay in a place where he receives insufficient food, and his health is injured, and death supervenes, the master is not criminally responsible.' The facts of this case would have supported an indictment on 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 26, post, p. 910. It seems very well worthy of consideration whether, where death results from the commission of an offence within that section, the case is not one of manslaughter, on the principle laid down in R. v. Senior [1899], 1 Q.B. 293, post, p. 674.

(n) 7 C. & P. 277. In a note to this case it is suggested that a statute, 18 Eliz. c. 3, s. 2 (now repealed), would hardly have been needed if a mother were liable at common law for the entire maintenance of her child.

supplied by her husband (q). The omission to provide food is the omission of the husband, and the crime of the wife can only be the omitting to deliver the food to the child after the husband has provided it' (r).

Under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834 (4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 76), s. 41, the mother of an illegitimate child, so long as she is unmarried or a widow, is bound to maintain this child as part of her family until the child is 16; and by sect. 57, a man who marries a woman who has legitimate or illegitimate children is liable to maintain them as part of his family till they are 16. So that the marriage, while it continues, suspends the liability of the mother (s). But the marriage does not extinguish affiliation orders made on the putative father of any such child (t).

The obligation to maintain legitimate children is recognised at common law and enforceable by statute (u).

In R. v. Bubb (v), an indictment for murder alleged that M. H., an infant of tender age, was a daughter of R. H., and was living with R. H. and E. B., and under their care and control, and unable to provide for or take care of herself, and that it was the duty of the prisoners to provide for and administer to M. H. sufficient food for the support of her body, and that the prisoners feloniously, &c., did refuse and neglect to give and administer to M. H. sufficient food for the support of her body; whereby she became mortally sick and died (v). B. was the sister of H.'s deceased wife, and on her death had gone to live with H., and became the manager of his household. H. was absent from home except from Saturday night until Monday morning, but always provided ample food for the whole family. H.'s children were healthy till B. undertook their management, but she

(r) The decision was given upon the opening statement of counsel. It did not appear whether the wife was living with the husband, nor whether he had the means of maintaining the child. In R. v. Forsyth (Chester Assizes, July 25, 1899: Archb. Cr. Pl. 23rd ed. 784), Kennedy, J., following this case and R. v. Squire, ruled that where husband and wife are living together, the legal obligation to maintain is on the husband, and that the wife cannot be convicted of manslaughter by neglect to supply food or medical aid. There may be cases where a wife may be liable to maintain her children during her husband's lifetime, as where the husband has deserted her, or she has a separate maintenance (see Christian's note to 1 Bl. Com. 448), and it may be worthy of consideration whether where the husband is incapable of work, but she is capable of maintaining her children, she is not legally bound so to do; and as the overseers of every parish are bound by law to provide necessary support in cases of emergency, it may well be doubted whether cases may not occur where the wife would be legally bound to apply for relief to the parish officers. Suppose a husband were ill in bed, but the wife were well, and the children starving for want of food, could it be fairly contended that she was under no legal obligation to apply for relief for them, and that if one of them died for want of food, she was not criminally responsible? See Urmston v. Newcomen, 4 A. & E. 899, and R. v. Mabbett, post, p. 673, C. S. G.

(v) 4 Cox, 457. The grand jury returned a bill for murder against E. B., and for manslaughter against R. H., and a bill for manslaughter in the same form, mutatis mutandis, as the bill for murder was then preferred against the latter, and B. was tried first.

systematically neglected them, especially the deceased, and, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the neighbours, persisted in withholding sufficient food, for want of which the child gradually wasted away, and died of actual starvation. Williams, J., told the jury that 'the indictment alleges, first, a duty on the part of the prisoner to supply the necessities of life to the child; it alleges, secondly, a malicious neglect or omission to perform that duty; and it alleges, thirdly, that the omission or neglect caused the death of the child. Now, first, with respect to the proposition that it was the duty of the prisoner to provide food necessary to sustain the life of the child. It is quite clear that the circumstance of the prisoner being aunt of the child, or being resident in the same house with the child, was not sufficient to cast upon her the duty of providing food for it. But if the prisoner undertook the charge of attending to the child, and of taking that care of it which its tender age required, a duty then arose to perform those duties properly; and if the prisoner, being in the capacity, as it were, of a servant or nurse, and having the charge of attending and taking care of the child, was furnished with the means of doing so properly, then the duty arose, which is charged in this indictment, of giving it sufficient food, and if the prisoner neglected to perform that duty, beyond all question she is criminally responsible. It remains for me to explain to what extent she is responsible. If the omission or neglect to perform the duty was malicious, then the indictment would be supported, and the crime of murder would be made out against the prisoner; but if the omission or neglect were simply culpable, but not arising from a malicious motive on the part of the prisoner, then it would be your duty to find her guilty of manslaughter only. And here it becomes necessary to explain what is meant by the expression malicious, which is thus used. If the omission to supply necessary food was accompanied with an intention to cause the death of the child, or to cause some serious bodily harm to it, then it would be malicious in the sense imputed to it by this indictment, and in a case of this kind it is difficult, if not impossible, to understand how a person who contemplated doing serious bodily injury to the child by the deprivation of food, could have meditated anything else than causing its death. You will, therefore, probably consider that the question resolves itself into this: Did the prisoner contemplate, by the course she pursued, the death of the child? If she did, and death was caused by the course she pursued, then she is guilty of murder. But if you are not satisfied that she contemplated the death of the child, then, although guilty of a culpable neglect of duty, it would amount only to the crime of manslaughter. If, on the other hand, you should think either that she did not undertake the duty of supplying the child with proper food, or that she did not culpably neglect that duty, then you will acquit her' (w).

On the trial of H. for the manslaughter of the same child, in addition to the facts proved on the trial of B., it was proved that when H. was at

(w) 'The indictment also alleged the duty to provide clothing and the neglect thereof; but as the child is alleged to have died of "actual starvation" all relating to the clothing has been omitted. This and the next case underwent the most careful consideration, and the law on the subject was fully discussed between Williams, J., Campbell, C.J., and Mr. Greaves, on a review of the previous cases.' C. S. G. See R. v. Conde, 10 Cox, 547. R. v. Macdonald [1904], Queensland St. Rep. 151. R. v. Brooks [1902], 5 Canada Cr. Cas. 372.

home B. treated the children better than on other occasions ; and that he had uniformly behaved kindly to them, and especially to the deceased. Williams, J., told the jury that ' this case differs from the last in this very essential particular, that here there is a duty directly cast upon the prisoner to provide sufficient food for the child if he has sufficient means for doing so, and inasmuch as it is proved that the prisoner had such means, there can be no doubt but that the law threw upon him the duty of preserving the child's life by providing it with proper food. But the peculiarity of the case is this, that inasmuch as we must take it that B. was guilty, she could not have been so, unless the prisoner had provided her with sufficient means for feeding the child, and it must be taken as an admitted fact in this case that the prisoner did take such steps as, but for B.'s misconduct, would have preserved the child's life. Then the question is how is the charge shaped against the prisoner ? If B. neglected her duty by depriving the child of food for any purpose, and the prisoner was conscious of it, and nevertheless chose to let her persevere in that course, he thus became himself an instrument, as it were, of depriving the child of sufficient food, and he would be guilty upon this indictment. If, therefore, you think he was conscious that B. deprived the child of food to such an extent as to render it dangerous to the child's life, and, being so conscious, instead of preventing her from continuing in this course, he allowed her to do so, and was culpably negligent of the obvious duty cast upon him, then he is guilty of manslaughter, because then substantially he would have neglected to provide the child with proper food ' (x).

Where parent, child, and servant reside in the same house, the duty of the parent is to provide food for the child, and the duty of the servant is to supply the food, when so provided by the parent, to the child, an indictment therefore charging both with the same duty cannot be supported ; but there ought to be separate indictments charging each in respect of the duty incumbent on each (y).

Upon an indictment against husband and wife for the murder of their infant child, it appeared that the child's death was produced by English cholera, and that insufficient food had a tendency to produce that complaint ; the husband was in work, but he spent the money he obtained on himself ; and the wife did not appear to have any money or food to give to the child. Martin, B., consulted Erle, J., and they were of opinion that it was the duty of all persons having children, when they themselves cannot support them, to endeavour to obtain the means of getting them support, and if they wilfully abstain from going to the union, where by law they have a right to support, and their children die in consequence, they are criminally responsible for it : but there ought to be a distinct abstaining to go for several days ; and if a married woman neglects for four or five days to go to the union for the purpose of getting support for a child, she knowing that such neglect would be likely to produce the death of the child, it is manslaughter (z).

By sect. 12 (1) of the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67), that section is to apply in the case of a parent, who, being without means to maintain the child, fails to provide for its maintenance under the Poor Law, in like manner as if the parent had otherwise neglected the child (a).

Where a woman took charge of the illegitimate child of her dead daughter, and the child died for want of proper nourishment, Brett, J., told the jury that mere negligence would not be sufficient to convict the prisoner. There must be negligence so great that they must be of opinion that the prisoner was reckless whether the child died or not. Her omission to send the child to the workhouse would not be sufficient. The question was whether she was wickedly careless. She might have been very careless, and ought to have done more than she did, but the case must be judged according to the state and condition of life of the prisoner, and the jury must say whether she had let the child die by wicked negligence or not (b).

Medical Aid.—By sect. 37 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 122) (c), when any parent wilfully neglected to provide medical aid for his child, being in his custody and under the age of fourteen years, whereby the health of such child was seriously injured, he was guilty of an offence punishable summarily before justices. Where from a conscientious religious conviction that in answer to prayer God would heal the sick, and in obedience to the tenets of a sect called the Peculiar People, and not from any intention to avoid the performance of his duty to his child or to break the law, the parent of a sick child, being one of such sect, while furnishing it with all necessary food and nourishment, refused to call in medical aid though well able to do so, and the child in the opinion of the jury died from not having such medical aid, it was held manslaughter (d). But in order to convict of manslaughter, it was necessary to prove that the neglect caused or accelerated the death and not merely that it might have done so (e).

In R. v. Senior (f), which arose, after the repeal of sect. 37 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, and under sect. 1 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894 (g), the prisoner was charged with the manslaughter of his infant child, of which he had the custody. He was one of the Peculiar People, and objected on religious grounds to calling in medical aid or to the use of medicine, and he had wilfully and deliberately abstained from providing medical aid for his child, though he knew it to be dangerously ill, but otherwise he had done all that he could for the child. The prisoner had the necessary means to provide medical aid, and it would have prolonged, and probably saved, the child's life. Upon a case reserved it was held that the prisoner had wilfully neglected the child in a manner likely to cause injury to its health, within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894 (gg), and having thereby caused or accelerated its death, he was guilty of manslaughter (h).

The prisoner was tried for the murder of her daughter: the case for the prosecution was that the prisoner, having great ill-will against the deceased, had purposely neglected to procure a midwife, or other proper person, to attend her daughter when she was taken in labour, and that by reason thereof she died in childbirth; she was about eighteen years of age and unmarried. The prisoner had married a second husband, and after the marriage the daughter had lived with them for some time, and then went out to service, occasionally returning to live with them when she was out of place; at last she returned to her step-father's house on a Tuesday, and continued there till the Saturday following, when she died. It was objected that the prisoner was under no legal obligation to procure or try to procure the attendance of a midwife. Williams, J., directed the jury to consider whether it was established by the evidence that the death was attributable to the prisoner's neglect to use ordinary diligence in procuring the assistance of a midwife, or other proper attendant, and if it was so established, then to consider whether by so neglecting she intended to bring about the death of her daughter; and if so, the jury were to convict her of murder; but if not, of manslaughter. The jury convicted her of manslaughter; and it was held that there was not an omission of any duty rendering the prisoner liable to be convicted. Assuming that if she had used ordinary care she would have procured the attendance of a midwife; that she knew where a midwife could be found; and that if the midwife had been summoned she would have attended; her skill must have been paid for, and there was no evidence that the prisoner had the means at her command of paying for that skill. The midwife would probably have attended without being paid. Yet the prisoner could not be criminally responsible for not asking for that aid, which, perhaps, might have been given without compensation. Aid of this kind was not always required in childbirth, and sometimes no ill consequences resulted from its absence (i).

down, Kennedy, J., held that it was not necessary to shew that the prisoner actually had money at the time she failed in her duty to provide food and medicine, if it was shewn that she had previously received money, and that under the circumstances she would naturally be expected to have some of the money still unspent at the time when the child was alleged to have been neglected.

subsequent death of a child, is not sufficient in itself to warrant a conviction of manslaughter.

Where on an indictment of a woman for the murder of her infant it appeared that the infant was found dead in a bag and that the mother had not made any preparation for its birth, she was held not guilty of manslaughter, although she knew she was about to be delivered, and wilfully abstained from taking the necessary precautions to preserve the life of the child after its birth, and the child died in consequence of that neglect (j).

In R. v. Handley (k), the prisoner was indicted for the wilful murder of her new-born child, and Brett, J., directed the jury (1) that if the prisoner either before or after the birth of the child had made up her mind that the child should die, and, after it was born alive, left it to die, and it did so in consequence, she would be guilty of murder; or (2) that if she made up her mind to conceal the birth, and did attempt to conceal it by methods which would probably end in its death, and they did end in death, she would be guilty of murder, even though she did not intend murder; or (3) that she would be guilty of manslaughter if she had determined that none but herself should be present at its birth, for the purpose of temporary concealment, and had caused the death of the child by wicked negligence after its birth.

In R. v. Izod (l), Channell, J., refused to accept the proposition that failure on the part of a woman to make proper provision for her expected confinement, resulting in the complete birth and subsequent death of a child, rendered her guilty of manslaughter, and he directed the jury that to support a verdict of manslaughter there must be some evidence of neglect after the child had been completely born.

The prisoner was indicted for the manslaughter of her child, and it appeared that she had been delivered of the child whilst on the seat of a privy, and that the child had breathed. The prisoner was seventeen years old, subject to epileptic fits, and this was her first child. Erle, J., told the jury, 'The question in this case is, whether there was any negligence on the part of the mother in not providing for the safety of her offspring. It is but reasonable to presume that the child dropped from her whilst she was on the privy. Now, if you think that she had the means and the power of procuring such assistance as might have saved the life of the child, by neglecting to do so she would be clearly guilty of manslaughter. But it is proper that you should take into your consideration that the prisoner is very young; that this was her first child; that she was subject to epileptic fits, and that the probability is that the child could have survived but a few moments after its immersion in the soil' (m).

Where a child is very young and not weaned, the mother is criminally responsible if the death arose from her not suckling the child when she was capable of doing so (n).

punishment on a child, and compels it to work for an unreasonable number of hours, and beyond its strength, and the child dies of a disease hastened by such ill-treatment, it will be murder if the treatment was of such a nature as to indicate malice; but if such person believed that the child was shamming illness, and was really able to do the work required, it will only be manslaughter, although the punishment were violent and excessive (o).

A person is criminally responsible if, having undertaken to provide necessaries for another, who is so aged and infirm that he is incapable of doing so for himself, he neglects such undertaking, with the result that death ensues; or if having confined another he neglects to supply him with necessaries, whereby the other dies. An indictment for murder stated that the deceased was of great age, and was residing in the house and under the care and control of the prisoner, and that it was his duty to take care of and find her sufficient meat, &c., and then alleged her death to have been caused by confining her against her will, and not providing her with meat and other necessaries. It appeared that the deceased was seventy-four years of age, and that upon the death of her sister, with whom she had lived, was taken away by the prisoner, he saying she was going home to live along with him till affairs were settled, and he would make her happy and comfortable; and that on another occasion the prisoner had said that in consideration of a transaction, which he mentioned, he had undertaken to keep the deceased comfortable as long as she lived. After some time the deceased was waited on by the prisoner and his wife, and remained locked in the kitchen alone, sometimes by the prisoner and sometimes by his wife, for hours together; and on several occasions had complained of being confined. In the cold weather no fire was discernible in the kitchen, and for some time before her death the deceased was continually locked in the kitchen, and not out of it at all. An undertaker's man stated that, from the appearance of the body, he thought she had died from want and starvation. A surgeon proved that the immediate cause of death was water on the brain; that the appearance of all parts of the body betokened the want of proper food and nourishment, that there was great emaciation of the body, and that the water on the brain might have been produced by exhaustion. Patteson, J., told the jury, 'If the prisoner was guilty of wilful neglect, so gross and wilful that you are satisfied he must have contemplated the death of the deceased, then he will be guilty of murder (p); if, however, you think only that he was so careless that her death was occasioned by his negligence, though he did not contemplate it, he will be guilty of manslaughter. The cases which have happened of this description have been generally cases of children and servants, where the duty has been apparent. This is not such a case; but it will be for you to say whether from the way in which the prisoner treated her, he had not by way of contract, in some way or other, taken upon him the performance of that duty, which she, from age and infirmity was incapable of doing.' After reading the evidence as to the contract, the learned judge added, 'This is the evidence on which you are called on to infer that the prisoner undertook to provide the deceased with necessaries; and though, if he broke that contract, he might not be liable to be indicted during her life (q), yet if by his negligence her death was occasioned, then he becomes criminally responsible' (r).

The prisoner, a woman of full age, who had no means of her own, lived with and was maintained by her aged aunt, and no one else lived with them. For the last ten days of her life the deceased was quite unable to attend to herself or to move about or do anything to procure assistance. During this time the prisoner lived in the house at the cost of the deceased, and took in the food supplies by the tradesmen, but apparently did not give any to the deceased, nor did she promise for her any nursing or medical attendance or inform any one of the condition of the deceased, although she could easily have done so, and no one but the prisoner had any knowledge of the condition in which her aunt was. The prisoner was convicted of manslaughter, and upon a case reserved it was held that it was the duty of the prisoner, under the circumstances, to supply her aunt with sufficient food to maintain life; and that the death of her aunt having been accelerated by neglect of this duty, she was properly convicted (s).

Upon an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner four years previously had separated from his wife, by mutual consent, the prisoner allowing her 2s. 6d. a week, which had been in general regularly paid, and the last payment was on the Sunday preceding her death. On the Tuesday she was turned out of her lodgings, being at that time suffering from diarrhoea. On the Wednesday she was in a house in a state of great illness, when the prisoner passed by, and was told he must take his wife away, as she could not shelter there. The prisoner replied, 'Turn her out; I won't be pestered with her,' and then walked away. The same evening, which was wet and dark, she was seen by a constable wandering about seeking shelter. He took her to the house where the prisoner lodged, and told him the state of his wife, who was ill and without lodging, and explained to him that it was incumbent on him to provide her with lodging and relief. He replied that he had no lodging for her; that she was a nasty beast, and he could not live with her. He shut the window and went away. On the Thursday the prisoner offered to pay for a bed for her at a public house, and she went to bed. On the Friday she died. The deceased was labouring under a complication of diseases, which must have speedily resulted in death. The surgeon stated that he considered the period of her existence had been abridged in consequence of her not having had shelter on the Wednesday night. Gurney, B., told the jury that there was no ground for any charge against the prisoner for having caused her death from want of food, as he had regularly paid her allowance to her, and he might have been compelled to pay her a larger sum if that had not been sufficient. Under ordinary circumstances he might have refused to have anything to do with her, but when she was ill and without shelter on a cold and wet night, the question assumed a different aspect, and it was whether they could certainly conclude that his refusal to give her shelter at that time had the effect of causing her death to occur sooner than that event would have happened in the ordinary course of nature (t).

As to neglect, abandonment, or ill-treatment of the helpless not followed by fatal results, see post, Chapter VIII. p. 907.

By Perjury.—It has been said that at common law, it was murder to bear false witness against another with an express premeditated design to take away his life, if the innocent person was condemned and executed (u). But this proposition is of doubtful authority. In 1692 a bill was introduced in Parliament to make it a capital offence to commit or suborn perjury in a capital case, but the bill did not pass into law (v). In the last instance of a prosecution for murder by perjury, the prisoners having been convicted, judgment was respited, in order that the point of law might be more fully considered upon a motion in arrest of judgment (w). The Attorney-General, however, declining to argue the point, the prisoners were discharged of that indictment; but it seems that there are good grounds for supposing that the Attorney-General declined to argue this point from prudential reasons, and principally lest witnesses might be deterred from giving evidence upon capital prosecutions if it must be at the peril of their own lives, but not from any apprehension that the point of law was not maintainable (x).

By Savage Animals.—If a man has a beast that is used to do mischief, and he, knowing it, suffers it to go abroad, and it kills a man, this has been considered by some as manslaughter in the owner (y); and it is agreed by all that such a person is guilty of a very gross misdemeanor (z); and if a man purposely turns such an animal loose, knowing its nature, it is as much murder (a) as if he had incited a bear or a dog to worry people; and this, though he did it merely to frighten them, and make what is called sport (b).

(b) 4 Bl. Com. 197. Hale (1 P. C. 431) says, that he had heard that it had been ruled to be murder, at the assizes held at St. Albans for Hertfordshire, and the owner hanged for it; but that it was but an hearsay.

On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the deceased, a child about eight years old, was killed by a kick from the prisoner's horse which had been in his possession about four years, and was a very vicious and dangerous animal, and had kicked and injured several persons, and some of these instances had been brought to the prisoner's knowledge, and he otherwise knew of the propensities of the horse. The deceased, with some other children, was on a common, and when on or very near a public path crossing the common, a vicious horse belonging to the prisoner and turned loose by him to graze on the common, kicked at the deceased, struck her on the head, and killed her. It was a question whether the deceased was on the path at the time she was kicked. The question was left to the jury whether the death of the child was caused by the culpable negligence of the prisoner, and they were told that they might find culpable negligence if the evidence satisfied them that the horse was so vicious and accustomed to kick as to be dangerous, and that the prisoner knew that it was so, and with that knowledge turned it loose on the common, through which there were to his knowledge open paths on which the public had a right to pass. The jury found the prisoner guilty of having caused the death by his culpable negligence, but that the evidence did not satisfy them one way or the other whether the child at the time she was kicked was on the path or beyond it. Upon a case reserved, Erle, C.J., said, 'I am of opinion that this conviction should be affirmed. The prisoner turned upon a common where there was a public footway a very dangerous animal, knowing what its propensities were, and it is found by the jury that the prisoner was guilty of culpable negligence in so doing, and that the death of the child was caused by the culpable negligence of the prisoner. That under ordinary circumstances would be sufficient to sustain a conviction for manslaughter; but the point contended for by the prisoner is, that the child was not on the path at the time when she was kicked, and her death caused thereby; and the jury were unable to say whether she was on the footway or beyond at the time. For the purpose of the judgment I assume that the child was not on the footway, but very near it. In point of reason I think that the prisoner ought to be held responsible in this case, and that it is not a ground of acquittal that the child had strayed off the pathway.' (After citing Barnes v. Ward, 9 C. B. 414), he continued, 'The principle of that case extends to a case like this, where a child walking on a public highway accidentally deviated into the neighbouring land, and met with her death from the kick of a vicious horse close to the public way.' . . . 'The public take a highway on the terms on which it is granted to them by the grantor, and, as between them and the grantor, must use the way subject to its risks; but the public are entitled to use the way without being subject to dangers like that in the present case. It was injurious to persons using the pathway in question to turn on the common a vicious animal of this kind. The judgment is confined to the fact of the child being near to the path at the time, and that, having accidentally strayed from the pathway, but being very near to it, her death was caused by the culpable negligence of the prisoner. I do not wish to sanction the notion that, because a person may not be civilly liable for an act of negligence, he is therefore not criminally liable. It is not necessary to discuss that proposition now ; however, I do not accede to it' (c).

By Want of Medical or Surgical Skill.—If a physician or surgeon, even though he is not a regular or licensed one (d), acting with due care and skill, gives his patient a potion or plaster, intending to do him good, and, contrary to the expectation of such physician or surgeon, it kills him, this is neither murder nor manslaughter, but misadventure (e).

Upon an indictment for manslaughter by causing the death by thrusting a round piece of ivory against the rectum, and thereby making a wound through the rectum, it appeared that upon examination of the body after death, a small hole was discovered perforated through the rectum. The prisoner had attended the deceased, but there was no evidence to shew how the wound had been caused, and questions were put in order to shew that it might have been the result of natural causes, and it was proposed to shew that the prisoner had had a regular medical education, and that a great number of cases had been successfully treated by him. Hullock, B. (stopping the case), 'This is an indictment for manslaughter, and I am really afraid to let the case go on, lest an idea should be entertained that a man's practice may be questioned whenever an operation fails. In this case there is no evidence of the mode in which this operation was performed ; and even assuming for the moment that it caused the death of the deceased, I am not aware of any law which says that this party can be found guilty of manslaughter. It is my opinion that it makes no difference whether the party be a regular or irregular surgeon ; indeed, in remote parts of the country, many persons would be left to die, if irregular surgeons were not allowed to practise. There is no doubt that there may be cases where both regular and irregular surgeons might be liable to an indictment, as there might be cases where, from the manner of the operation, even malice might be inferred. All that the law-books (f) have said has been read to you, but they do not state any decisions, and their silence in this respect goes to shew what the uniform opinion of lawyers has been upon this subject. As to what is said by Lord Coke, he merely details an authority, a very old one, without expressing either approbation or disapprobation ; however, we find that Lord Hale has laid down what is the law on this subject. That is copied by Blackstone, J., and no book in the law goes any further. It may be that a person not legally qualified to practise as a surgeon may be liable to penalties, but surely he cannot be liable to an indictment for felony. It is quite clear you may recover damages against a medical man for want of skill ; but as my Lord Hale (g) says, "God forbid that any mischance of this kind should make a person guilty of murder or manslaughter." Such is the opinion of one of the greatest judges that ever adorned the Bench of this country ; and his proposition amounts to this, that if a person, bona-fide and honestly exercising his best skill to cure a patient, performs an operation, which causes the patient's death, he is not guilty of manslaughter. In the present case no evidence has been given respecting the operation itself. It might have been performed with the most proper instrument and in the most proper manner, and yet might have failed. Mr. L. has himself told us that he performed an operation, the propriety of which seems to have been a sort of voxata quæstio among the medical profession; but still it would be most dangerous for it to get abroad that, if an operation performed either by a licensed or unlicensed surgeon should fail, that surgeon would be liable to be prosecuted for manslaughter' (h).

In R. v. Williamson (i), the prisoner, who was indicted for the murder of Mrs. D., was not a regularly educated accoucheur, but was a person who had been in the habit of acting as a man-midwife among the lower classes of people. Mrs. D. had been delivered by the prisoner on a Friday, and on the Sunday following an unusual appearance took place, which the medical witnesses stated to be a prolapsus uteri; this the prisoner mistook for a remaining part of the placenta, which had not been brought away at the time of the delivery: he attempted to bring away the prolapsed uterus by force, and in so doing he lacerated the uterus, and tore asunder the mesenteric artery; this caused the death of the patient; and it appeared, from the testimony of a number of medical witnesses, that there must have been great want of anatomical knowledge in the prisoner. It was proved that the prisoner had safely delivered many other women. Ellenborough, C.J., said, 'There has not been a particle of evidence adduced which goes to convict the prisoner of the crime of murder, but still it is for you to consider whether the evidence goes as far as to make out a case of manslaughter. To substantiate that charge, the prisoner must have been guilty of criminal misconduct, arising either from the grossest ignorance, or the most criminal inattention. One or other of these is necessary to make him guilty of that criminal negligence and misconduct which is essential to make out a case of manslaughter. It does not appear that in this case there was any want of attention on his part; and from the evidence of the witnesses on his behalf, it appears that he had delivered many women at different times, and from this he must have had some degree of skill' (j).

In R. v. St. John Long (k), upon an indictment for manslaughter by feloniously rubbing Miss C. with a dangerous liquid, it appeared that two of the family had died of consumption, but that Miss C. had enjoyed good health. Mrs. C. having heard that the prisoner had said that unless Miss C. put herself under his care she would die of consumption in two or three months, placed her under his course of treatment. The prisoner rubbed a mixture on different parts of the bodies of his patients, and this was applied to Miss C. by the prisoner's direction. A wound appeared on Miss C.'s back, to which the prisoner's attention was directed, and he stated that this proceeded from the inhaling, and that unless those appearances were produced he could expect no beneficial result. Miss C. was suffering much from sickness, and the prisoner said it was of no consequence, but a benefit; and that those symptoms, combined with the wound, were proof that his system was taking due effect. Miss C. having got worse, the prisoner said that in two or three days she would be better in health than she had ever been in her life. At this interview the wound, which had extended, was shewn to the prisoner. He also stated on that day, and on Monday, the 16th, that Miss C. was doing uncommonly well. On Tuesday, the 17th, she died. An eminent surgeon proved that on the Monday her back was extensively inflamed, and in the centre was a spot, as large as the palm of the hand, black, and dead, and in a mortified state, and he thought that some very powerfully stimulating liniment had been applied to her back; that applying a lotion of a strength capable of causing the appearances he saw, to a person of the age and constitution of the deceased, if in perfect health, was likely to damage the constitution and produce disease and danger. The appearances on the back were quite sufficient to account for her death. On the most careful examination of the body, after death, no latent disease or seeds of disease were discovered. It was submitted, for the defence, that, in point of law, this was nothing like a case of manslaughter, and 1 Hale, P. C. 429, 4 Bl. Com. b. 4, c. 14, and R. v. Van Butchell (l), were cited and relied on. Park, J., said, 'I am in this difficulty; I have an opinion, and my learned brother differs from me; I must, therefore, let the case go to the jury.' Garrow, B., said, 'In R. v. Van Butchell the learned judge had very good ground to stop the case, as there was no evidence as to what had been done. I make no distinction between the case of a person who consults the most eminent physician, and the cases of those whose necessities or whose folly may carry them into any other quarter. It matters not whether the individual consulted be the president of the College of Physicians, the president of the College of Surgeons, or the humblest bone-setter of the village; but be it one or the other, he ought to bring into the case ordinary care, skill, and diligence. Why is it that we convict in cases of death by driving carriages? Because the parties are bound to have skill, care, and caution. I am of opinion that, if a person, who has ever so much or so little skill, sets my leg, and does it as well as he can, and does it badly, he is excused; but suppose the person comes drunk, and gives me a tumbler full of laudanum, and sends me into the other world, is it not manslaughter? And why is that? Because I have a right to have reasonable care and caution.' Park, J., in summing up, said, 'The learned counsel truly stated in the outset that whether the party be licensed or unlicensed is of no consequence, except in this respect, that he may be subject to pecuniary penalties for acting contrary to charters or Acts of Parliament; but it cannot affect him here.' (After citing 1 Hale, 429, as an authority in point, the learned judge proceeded), 'I agree with my learned brother that what is called mala praxis in a medical person is a misdemeanor; but that depends upon whether the practice he has used is so bad that everybody will see that it is mala praxis. The case at Lancaster (m) differs from this case. I have communicated with Tindal, C.J., who tried that case, and he informed me that the man was a blacksmith, and was drunk, and so completely ignorant of the proper steps, that he totally neglected what was absolutely necessary after the birth of the child. That certainly was one of the most outrageous cases that ever came into a court of justice. I would rather use the words of Lord Ellenborough in R. v. Williamson (n). (His lordship read them.) 'And this is important here, for though he be not licensed, yet experience may teach a man sufficient; and the question for you will be, whether the experience this individual acquired does not negative the supposition of any gross ignorance or criminal inattention?' (After setting the authority of Hale, P. C. 429, against the dictum of Lord Coke, 4 Inst, 251, and citing the observations of Hullock, B., in R. v. Van Butchell (o) with approbation, his lordship proceeded), 'With respect to the application of the mixture, if he commanded the servant to use it, it is the same as if he used it himself. Perhaps from the evidence you will think that the act caused the death; but still the question recurs as to whether it was done either from gross ignorance or criminal inattention. No one doubts Mr. B.'s skill, but that is not quite the question; it is not whether the act done is the thing that a person of Mr. B.'s great skill would do, but whether it shews such total and gross ignorance in the person who did it, as must necessarily produce such a result. On the one hand, we must be careful and most anxious to prevent people from tampering in physic, so as to trifle with the life of man; and, on the other, we must take care not to charge criminally a person who is of general skill, because he has been unfortunate in a particular case.' 'If you think there was gross ignorance or scandalous inattention in the conduct of the prisoner, then you will find him guilty; if you do not think so, then your verdict will be otherwise' (p).

(j) In addition to the facts above stated, it was proved that the prisoner had attended the deceased in seven previous confinements with perfect success, and that the deceased wished him to attend her in her last confinement. See 4 C. & P. 407 (n).

Upon a similar indictment against the same person (q) for causing the death of Mrs. L., it appeared that she put herself under his care on October 6, at which time she was in very good health, to be cured of a complaint she had in her throat. On the 3rd she had applied a small blister to her throat, but the wound occasioned by it was nearly well on the 6th. On the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th she went to the prisoner's, and on the evening of the 10th complained to her husband of a violent burning across her chest, in consequence of which he looked at it, and found a great redness across her bosom, darker in the centre than at the other parts; she also complained of great chilliness, and shivered with cold, and passed a very restless and uncomfortable night. On the 11th she was very unwell all the day, the redness was more vivid, and the spot in the centre darker, round the edges white and puffed up, and there was a dirty white discharge from the centre. Cabbage leaves had been applied. On the 12th the redness on the breast and chest was, if anything, greater.

In consequence of the symptoms, the husband went to the prisoner, who asked why Mrs. L. had not come to inhale and go on with the rubbing ; the husband replied it was impossible, she was so ill ; she had been constantly unwell since the night of the 10th, and was suffering a great deal of pain and sickness. The prisoner said it would soon go off, it was generally the case. He was told of the shivering and chilliness, and that some hot wine and water had been given to relieve her ; he said hot brandy and water would have been better, and to put her head under the bed-clothes. He was told that her chest and breast looked very red and very bad ; he said that was generally the case in the first instance, but it would go off as she got better, and that the husband need not be uneasy about it, as there was no fear or danger. In the course of the day the cabbage leaves had been removed, and a dressing of spermaceti ointment put on the chest instead. In the evening the prisoner came and saw Mrs. L. and looked at her breast, and observing the dressing said those greasy plasters had no business there, and she ought to have continued the cabbage leaves. He then asked for a towel, and began dabbing it on the breast, particularly in the centre, where the discharge came from. He said that old linen was the best thing to heal a wound of that kind. But she might use the dressing if she liked it, he saw no objection, and when it skinned over he would rub it again. He never saw her afterwards ; she died on the 8th of November. A surgeon proved that on October 12 he found a very extensive wound covering the whole anterior part of the chest, which, in his opinion, might be produced by any strong acid : the skin was destroyed ; the centre of the wound was darker, and in a higher state of inflammation than the other parts ; he considered the wound very dangerous to life when he first saw it : the centre spot, and the upper part became gangrenous in about a week ; and in his opinion Mrs. L. died of the wound, and according to his judgment it was not necessary or proper to produce such a wound to prevent any difficulty in swallowing, and he did not know of any disease in which the production of such a wound would be necessary or proper. The body was internally and externally in perfect health, except a little narrowness at the entrance of the œsophagus. Another surgeon stated that he thought that a man of common prudence or skill would not have applied a liquid which in two days would produce such extensive inflammation, though all irritating external applications sometimes exceeded the expectations of the medical attendant ; but he should say that such conduct was a proof of rashness and of ignorance. It was submitted that this was not manslaughter, but homicide per infortunium ; that where the mind is pure, and the intention benevolent, and there are no personal motives, such as a desire of gain, if an operation be performed which fails, the party is not responsible ; and that the indictment, which in substance charged that the death was occasioned by the external application, was not supported. There was no count imputing ignorance or want of skill, or hastiness, or roughness of practice. Bayley, B., 'I agree with Lord Hale (r), and do not think that there is any difference between a licensed and unlicensed surgeon. It does not follow that in the case of either, an act done may not amount to manslaughter. There may be cases in which a regular medical man may be guilty ; and that is all that Lord Hale lays down. And that may be laid out of the question in this case. But the manner in which the act is done, and the use of due caution, seem to me to be material. Foster, J., p. 263, speaking of a person who happens to kill another by driving a cart or other carriage, says, " If he might have seen the danger, and did not look before him, it will be manslaughter for want of due circumspection." And there is also a passage in Bracton to the like effect. But all that I mean to say now is, that there being conflicting authorities, and the impression on our minds not being in your favour, I propose to reserve the point. As to the indictment not being supported by the evidence, one of the allegations is that the prisoner feloniously applied a noxious and injurious matter. And there is no doubt, if the jury should be of opinion against the prisoner, that the facts proved will be sufficient to warrant their finding that the prisoner feloniously did the act ; for if a man, either with gross ignorance or gross rashness, administers medicine and death ensues, it will be clearly felony.' It was then objected that in this case, as in larceny, there must be a trespass proved. It was not proved that any fraud had been practised by the prisoner to get the patient under his care ; nor had there been any avaricious seeking after fees : if there had been it might have been evidence to shew the existence of trespass. In R. v. Van Butchell (s), the case was stopped because there was no evidence of how the operation was performed, and here there was not any evidence to shew the mode in which the application was made. Bayley, B., ' In this case we may judge of the thing by the effect produced, and that may be evidence from which the jury may say whether the thing which produced such an effect was not improperly applied.' Bolland, B., ' When you pass the line which the law allows, then you become a trespasser.' Bayley, B., ' If I had a clear opinion in your favour, or if my brothers had, or if we had any reason to think that other judges were of a different opinion, it would become our duty to give our opinion here, and prevent the case from going to the jury : but feeling as I do, notwithstanding all I have heard to-day, and myself and my brothers having had our attention directed to the law before we came here, I think it right that the case should go to the jury ; I think that if the jury shall find a given fact in the way in which I shall submit it to them, it will constitute the crime of feloniously administering, so as to make it manslaughter. I do not charge it on ignorance merely, but there may have been rashness ; and I consider that rashness will be sufficient to make it manslaughter. As for instance, if I have a toothache, and a person undertakes to cure it by administering laudanum, and says, " I have no notion how much will be sufficient," but gives me a cup full, which immediately kills me ; or if a person prescribing James's powder says, " I have no notion how much should be taken," and yet gives me a tablespoonful, which has the same effect ; such person acting with rashness will, in my opinion, be guilty of manslaughter. With respect to what has been said about a willing mind in the patient, it must be remembered that a prosecution is for the public benefit, and the willingness of the patient cannot take away the offence against the public.' In summing up, Bayley, B., said, 'The points for your consideration are, first: whether Mrs. L. came to her death by the application of the liquid; secondly, whether the prisoner, in applying it, has acted feloniously or not. To my mind it matters not whether a man has received a medical education or not; the thing to look at is, whether, in reference to the remedy he has used, and the conduct he has displayed, he has acted with a due degree of caution, or, on the contrary, has acted with gross and improper rashness and want of caution. I have no hesitation in saying for your guidance, that if a man be guilty of gross negligence in attending to his patient after he has applied a remedy, or of gross rashness in the application of it, and death ensues in consequence, he will be liable to conviction for manslaughter.' 'If you shall be of opinion that the prisoner made the application with a gross and culpable degree of rashness, and that it was the cause of Mrs. L.'s death, then, heavy as the charge against him is, he will be answerable on this indictment for the offence of manslaughter. There was a considerable interval between the application of the liquid and the death of the patient; yet if you think that the infliction of the wound on the 10th of October was the cause of the death, then it is no answer to say that a different course of treatment by Mr. C. might have prevented it. You will consider these two points: first, of what did Mrs. L. die? You must be satisfied that she died of the wound, which was the result of the application made on the 10th of October; and then, secondly, if you are satisfied of this, whether the application was a felonious application; this will depend upon whether you think it was gross and culpable rashness in the prisoner to apply a remedy which might produce such effects in such a manner that it did actually produce them. If you think so then he will be answerable to the full extent' (t).

Any person, whether he is a properly qualified medical practitioner or not, who professes to deal with the life or health of others, is bound to have competent skill to perform the task that he holds himself out to perform, and bound to treat his patients with care, attention, and assiduity, and if a patient dies for want thereof, is guilty of manslaughter (u).

(t) The prisoner was acquitted. There was no negligence or inattention in the prisoner after the applications, as he did not know where Mrs. L. was until October 12, and after that time she was attended by Mr. C. See R. v. Macleod, 12 Cox, 534, where the prisoner administered morphia without weighing it; and R. v. Zeifert, 148 C. C. Sess. Pap. 630, where a prisoner administered cocaine to a woman who, unknown to him, was suffering from a weak heart.

(u) R. v. Spiller, 5 C. & P. 333, Bolland, B., and Bosanquet, J. In Lanphier v. Phipps, 8 C. & P. 475, Tindal, C.J., said, 'Every person who enters into a learned profession undertakes to bring to the exercise of it a reasonable degree of care and skill. He does not undertake, if he is an attorney, that at all events you shall gain your cause; nor does a surgeon undertake that he will perform a cure, nor does he undertake to use the highest possible degree of skill; there may be persons who have higher education and greater advantages than he has; but he undertakes to bring a fair, reasonable, and competent degree of skill. See R. v. Ferguson, 1 Lew. 181. R. v. Spilling, 2 M. & Rob. 107. *R. v. administering medicines, Pollock, C.B., told the jury that 'it is no crime for any one to administer medicine, but it is a crime to administer it so rashly and carelessly as to produce death; and in this respect there is no difference between the most regular practitioner and the greatest quack' (v). An unskilled practitioner is guilty of negligence if he prescribes dangerous medicines of the use of which he is ignorant (w).

Where the deceased had once been operated upon for cancer, and the disease again appeared in his face, and the prisoner, a blacksmith, told him he could cure him, and the deceased consented to place himself in his hands, and he put some kind of oil on his face, and then applied some kind of powder which caused the greatest agony, and death ensued in nine days. After the prisoner had been employed there was a line of demarcation around the tumour, and all the tissues were destroyed, as if some powerful caustic had been applied, and the general symptoms shewed poisoning by some irritant poison. On a post-mortem examination marks were found of extensive inflammation in the bowels and numerous ulcerations, which were the effects of mercury applied to the tumour; and the deceased died from the effects of corrosive sublimate, which was sometimes applied to wounds, but not to cancer. The deceased must have died of the cancer, but his death was accelerated by the application of the sublimate. Watson, B., directed the jury to find the prisoner guilty if they considered he took upon himself the responsibility of attending to a patient suffering under cancer, when he was not qualified for the purpose. If he used dangerous applications, he was bound to bring skill in their use; and he thought that the prisoner's education and employment made the use of these dangerous substances almost amount to want of skill. The jury must, however, say whether what the prisoner did produced or accelerated the death; or (and) whether the prisoner in their opinion had acted with neglect in using such remedies (x).

A prisoner, formerly a butcher, who had practised as a surgeon for many years without any legal qualification, was indicted for the manslaughter of a man on whom he had performed an operation for a disease in the bone. The only question was whether the practice of the prisoner in the particular case amounted to gross and culpable negligence. Several medical men having proved that the treatment pursued by the prisoner exhibited the grossest and most culpable ignorance, it was proposed for the defence to call witnesses to prove that the prisoner had treated them for similar complaints successfully, and R. v. Williamson (y) was relied upon. Maule, J., refused to allow the witnesses to be examined, saying, 'In R. v. Williamson the witnesses were asked generally causa sciente. Neither on the one hand nor the other can other cases be gone into. The attention of the jury must be confined to the present case.' And in summing up the learned judge said, 'If a medical or any other man caused the death of another intentionally, that would be murder; but where a person not intending to kill a man, by his gross negligence, unskilfulness, and ignorance caused the death of another, then he would be guilty of culpable homicide; and the question for the jury is, whether the deceased died from the effects of the operation performed on him by the prisoner, and whether the treatment pursued by the prisoner in the case of the deceased was marked by negligence, unskilfulness, and ignorance' (z).

In R. v. Noakes (a), a mistake on the part of a chemist in putting a poisonous liniment into a medicine bottle, instead of a liniment bottle, in consequence of which the liniment was taken by the customer internally with fatal results, was held not to amount to such criminal negligence as to warrant a conviction for manslaughter, the mistake having been made under circumstances which rather threw the prisoner off his guard.

On an indictment for manslaughter against a medical man by administering poison in mistake for another drug the prosecution must shew that the poison got into the mixture in consequence of his gross and culpable negligence, and it is not sufficient to shew merely that the prisoner, who dispensed his own drugs, supplied a mixture which contained a large quantity of poison (b).

By Infection.—The question is raised by Hale, whether, if the person infected with the plague should go abroad with the intention of infecting another, and another should thereby be infected and die, this would not be murder; but it is admitted that, if no such intention should evidently appear, it would not be felony, though a great misdemeanor (c).

Persons who go about in public when suffering from infectious disease may be indicted at common law (d), or summarily punished under the Public Health Acts (e).

By Rape.—In R. v. Ladd (f), the question was raised but not decided, whether an indictment for murder could be maintained for killing a female infant by ravishing her; but there is no doubt that it may. The prisoner was indicted for the murder of a child under ten, and it appeared that he had had connection with her and given her the venereal disease; and Wightman, J., told the jury that if they were of opinion that the prisoner had had connection with her, and she died from its effects, then the act being, under the circumstances of the case, a felony in point of law, this would of itself be such malice as would justify them in finding him guilty of murder (g).

report proceeds, 'The jury retired, and, after some time, returned into Court, saying that they were satisfied that he had had connection, and that her death resulted therefrom, but were not agreed as to finding him guilty of murder. Wightman, J., told them that, under these circumstances, it was open to them to find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, and that they might ignore the doctrine of constructive malice if they thought fit. The jury found a verdict of manslaughter.' Sed quare. C. S. G.

SECT. V.—TIME OF DEATH—TREATMENT OF WOUNDS—KILLING PERSON LABOURING UNDER DISEASE.

Time of Death.—No person can be convicted of the murder or manslaughter of another, who does not die within a year and a day after the stroke received, or cause of death administered, in the computation of which the whole day upon which the hurt was done is to be reckoned the first (h).

Treatment of Wounds.—Questions occasionally arise as to the treatment of the wound or hurt received by the party killed. On an indictment for murder it appeared that the deceased had been waylaid and assaulted by the prisoner and severely cut across one of his fingers by an iron instrument, and the surgeon urged him to submit to amputation, but he refused, though he was told that his life would be in great hazard ; and it was dressed day by day for a fortnight ; when lockjaw came on, induced by the wound in the finger, and the finger was then amputated, but too late ; and the lockjaw ultimately caused death. The surgeon thought it most probable that the life would have been saved if the finger had been amputated in the first instance ; and it was contended that it was the obstinate refusal to submit to amputation that was the cause of the death. Maule, J., told the jury that if the prisoner wilfully, and without any justifiable cause, inflicted the wound, which was ultimately the cause of the death, he was guilty of murder ; that it made no difference whether the wound was in its own nature instantly mortal, or whether it became the cause of death by reason of the deceased not having adopted the best mode of treatment ; the real question was whether in the end the wound was the cause of death (i). This ruling accords with the judgment and dictum given in the earlier authorities (j).

On an indictment against a principal in the second degree for murder by shooting in a duel, after the examination of the first medical witness, who stated his opinion that the operation (of which no account is given in the report) was the only chance of saving the life of the deceased ; counsel for the prisoner were proceeding to cross-examine him as to the nature and seat of the wound, to shew that the opinions he had expressed of its danger and the necessity of the operation were not correct. Erle, J., said : ' I presume you propose to call counter-evidence and impeach the propriety of the operation ; but I am clearly of opinion that if a dangerous wound is given, and the best advice is taken, and an operation performed under that advice, which is the immediate cause of death, the party giving the wound is criminally responsible.' It was proposed to shew that the opinion formed by the medical men was grounded upon erroneous premises, and that no operation was necessary at all, or at least that an easier and much less dangerous operation ought to have been adopted ; and it was submitted that a person is not criminally responsible where the death is caused by consequences which are not physically the consequences of the wound, but can only be connected with the first wound by moral reasonings; as here that which occasioned death was the operation, which supervened upon the wound, because the medical men thought it necessary. Erle, J., said, 'I am clearly of opinion, and so is my brother Rolfe, that where a wound is given, which, in the judgment of competent medical advisers, is dangerous, and the treatment which they bona fide adopt is the immediate cause of death, the party who inflicted the wound is criminally responsible, and of course those who aided and abetted him in it. I so rule on the present occasion; but it may be taken, for the purpose of future consideration, that it having been proven that there was a gunshot wound, and a pulsating tumour arising therefrom, which, in the bona fide opinion of competent medical men, was dangerous to life, and that they considered a certain operation necessary, which was skilfully performed, and was the immediate and proximate cause of death; the counsel for the prisoner tendered evidence to shew this opinion was wrong, and that the wound would not have inevitably caused death, and that by other treatment the operation might have been avoided, and was therefore unnecessary. I will reserve this point for the consideration of the judges, although I have no doubt upon the subject. To admit this evidence would be to raise a collateral issue in every case as to the degree of skill which the medical men possessed' (k).

Where the deceased had been severely kicked on the stomach, and brandy had been given her by a surgeon to restore her, and part of it had gone the wrong way into the lungs, and might, perhaps, have caused the death, the prisoner was convicted of manslaughter, and Coleridge, J., said the case was like that where a dangerous wound was given, and an operation was performed (l).

The prisoner had a fight with the deceased and struck him on the jaw, breaking it in two places, which rendered an operation necessary. Chloroform was administered, and the patient died under its administration. It was not disputed that if the chloroform had not been administered the man would not have died. Mathew, J., after consulting Field, J., held that since the chloroform had been properly administered by a regular medical practitioner, the fact that the death primarily resulted from its use could not affect the criminal responsibility of the accused, and told the jury that if an injury was inflicted by one man on another which compelled the injured man to take medical advice, and if death ensued from or in the course of an operation advised by the medical man, the assailant was responsible in the eye of the law. The jury must be satisfied that the prisoner injured the deceased; that he rightly consulted a competent medical man; that an operation was recommended for which the administration of chloroform was necessary; and that the deceased died from that administration (m).

Death from Disease supervening upon Blows.—It would seem that where a fatal disease is set up by a felonious act, the person who did the act may be guilty of homicide. In Brintons, Ltd., v. Turvey (n), Lord Halsbury said, 'An injury to the head has been known to set up septic pneumonia, and many years ago, I remember when that incident had in fact occurred, it was sought to excuse the person who inflicted the blow on the head, from the consequences of his crime, because his victim had died of pneumonia and not as it was contended of the blow on the head. It does not appear to me that by calling the consequences of an accidental injury a disease, one alters the nature of the consequential results of the injury that has been inflicted' (o).

Killing a Person labouring under Disease.—If a man is sick of some disease, which, by the course of nature, might possibly end his life in half a year, and another gives him a wound or hurt which hastens his death, by irritating and provoking the disease to operate more violently and speedily, this is murder or other homicide, according to the circumstances, in the party by whom such hurt or wound was given. For the person wounded does not die simply ex visitatione Dei, but his death is hastened by the hurt which he received; and the offender is not allowed to apportion his own wrong (p).

Where a husband was indicted for the manslaughter of his wife by accelerating her death by blows, and it appeared that she was at the time in so bad a state of health that she could not possibly have lived more than a month or six weeks under any circumstances: Coleridge, J., told the jury that if a person inflicted an injury upon a person labouring under a mortal disease, which caused that person to die sooner than he otherwise would have done, he was liable to be found guilty of manslaughter, and the question for them was whether the death of the wife was caused by the disease under which she was labouring, or whether it was hastened by the ill usage of the prisoner (q).

SECT. VI.—PROVOCATION.

As the indulgence which is shewn by the law in some cases to the first transport of passion is a condescension to the frailty of the human frame, to the furor brevis, which, while the frenzy lasts, renders a man deaf to the voice of reason; so the provocation which is allowed to extenuate in the case of homicide must be something which a man is conscious of, which he feels and resents at the instant the fact which he would extenuate is committed (r). All the circumstances of the case must lead

(p) Hale (1 P. C. 428) says that thus he had heard that learned and wise judge, Rolfe, J., frequently direct. In R. v. Johnson, 1 Lew. 164, on an indictment for manslaughter in causing a death by a blow on the stomach, on a surgeon stating that a blow on the stomach in this state of things, arising from passion and intoxication, was calculated to occasion death, but not so if the party was sober, Hullock, B., is said to have directed an acquittal, saying, 'that where the death was occasioned partly by a blow, and partly by a predisposing circumstance, it was impossible so to apportion the operations of the several causes as to be able to say with certainty that the death was immediately occasioned by any one of them in particular.' This ruling is questioned in Roscoe Cr. Ev. (13th ed.) 616, and as it would seem with very good reason, as it is contrary to the other authorities upon this point. C. S. G. See R. v. Martin, 5 C. & P. 128, Parke, B., and Stephen Dig. Cr. L. (6th ed.) art. 241.

to the conclusion that the act done, though intended or calculated to cause death or great bodily harm, was not the result of cool deliberate judgment and previous malignity of heart, but solely imputable to human infirmity (s). For there are many trivial, and some considerable provocations, which are not permitted to extenuate an act of homicide, or rebut the conclusion of malice, to which the other circumstances of the case may lead.

Words of Provocation.—In R. v. Taylor (t), Lord Mansfield said: ‘It is settled that words are not a sufficient provocation, but blows are a sufficient provocation to lessen the crime into manslaughter.’ In R. v. Rothwell (u), where the prisoner was indicted for the wilful murder of his wife, Blackburn, J., in summing up, said: ‘As a general rule of law, no provocation of words will reduce the crime of murder to that of manslaughter, but under special circumstances there may be such a provocation of words as will have that effect; for instance, if a husband suddenly hearing from his wife that she had committed adultery, and he, having had no idea of such a thing before, were thereupon to kill her, it might be manslaughter. Now, in this case, words spoken by the deceased just previous to the blows inflicted by the prisoner were these: “Aye; but I’ll take no more for thee, for I will have no more children of thee. I have done it once, and I’ll do it again.” Now, what you will have to consider is, would these words, which were spoken just previous to the blows, amount to such a provocation as would in an ordinary man, not in a man of violent or passionate disposition, provoke him in such a way as to justify him in striking her as the prisoner did?’ (v).

In R. v. Jones (w), the prisoner was charged with the murder of his wife by cutting her throat with a razor. The prisoner and his wife had been living apart, and the prisoner asked her to come and live with him, but she refused, saying, ‘No. If I want 3s. I can get it off K., and I can sleep with him.’ Bucknill, J., after referring to R. v. Rothwell, supra, told the jury that the great majority of the authorities were agreed that words were not a sufficient provocation, but that they could, if they thought fit, find that these words amounted to a provocation.

The earlier authorities indicate some uncertainty on the question how far, if at all, words are sufficient provocation, and the question is involved with the further question as to the nature of the weapon used, and the character of the blow given.

In Lord Morley’s case (x), where it was decided that if A. gave slighting words to B., and B. thereupon immediately killed her, such killing would be murder in B., it is also stated to have been held, that words of menace or bodily harm would amount to such a provocation as would reduce the offence of killing to manslaughter. But in another report of the same case this latter position is not to be found (y) ; and it has been stated that such words ought at least to be accompanied by some act, denoting an immediate intention of following them up by an actual assault (z).

A woman called a man, who was sitting drinking in an alehouse, 'a son of a whore,' upon which the man took up a broomstaff, and at a distance threw it at her and killed her ; and it was propounded to the judges whether this was murder or manslaughter. Two questions were made, 1. Whether bare words, or words of this nature, would amount to such a provocation as would extenuate the fact into manslaughter. 2. Admitting that they would not, in case there had been a striking with such an instrument as necessarily would have caused death, as stabbing with a sword or shooting with a pistol ; yet whether this striking, so improbable to cause death, would not alter the case. The judges were not unanimous upon this case ; and a pardon was recommended (a).

A., passing by the shop of B., distorted his mouth, and smiled at him, and B. killed him : this was held murder ; for it was no such provocation as would abate the presumption of malice in the party killing (b).

D. was sentenced for a gross libel to be flogged from Newgate to Tyburn, and as he was returning from Tyburn, F., a barrister, asked him, in a jeering way, whether he had run his heat that day ; he replied in scurrilous words ; whereon F. ran him into the eye with a small cane in his hand, and of this wound D. died, and F. was executed for his murder (c).

If, on a quarrel between husband and wife, the husband strikes his wife thereupon with a pestle, so that she dies presently, it is murder ; and the wife's chiding will not be a provocation to extenuate it to manslaughter (d).

If A. is passing along the street, and B., meeting him (there being a convenient distance between A. and the wall), takes the wall of him, and thereupon A. kills B., this is a murder ; but if B. had jostled A., his jostling would have been a provocation, reducing the offence to manslaughter (e).

If a party, being provoked by another making use of contemptuous or insulting actions or gestures, gives the other a box on the ear, or strikes him with a stick or other weapon not likely to kill, and kills him unluckily and against his intention, it will be only manslaughter (f).

It seems that if A. uses indecent language to B., and B. thereupon strikes A., but not mortally, and then A. strikes B. again, and then B. kills A., the stroke by A. is a new provocation, and the conflict a sudden falling out ; and on those grounds the killing is only manslaughter (g).

Provocation by Assault.—Though an assault made with violence or circumstances of indignity upon a man's person, and resented immediately by the party acting in the heat of blood upon that provocation, and killing the aggressor, will reduce the crime to manslaughter (h), yet it must by no means be understood that the crime will be so extenuated by any trivial provocation which in point of law may amount to an assault; nor in all cases even by a blow (i). Violent acts of resentment, bearing no proportion to the provocation or insult, are barbarous, proceeding rather from brutal malignity than human frailty; and barbarity will often make malice (j).

Upon an indictment for murder it appeared that upon the evening before the death the prisoner and the deceased had been quarrelling, and that the deceased had used very aggravating language, as well as very indecent and insulting gestures to the prisoner. The deceased was found dead the next morning with a wound in the throat, which had caused her death, and had been inflicted by some sharp instrument, such as a razor. Within a short distance of the deceased there was lying a sweeping-brush in such a position that it might be supposed to have fallen from the hand of the deceased, supposing that a scuffle had taken place before the fatal wound had been inflicted. Pollock, C.B., in summing up, said, 'It is true that no provocation by words only (k) will reduce the crime of murder to that of manslaughter, but it is equally true that every provocation by blows will not have this effect, particularly when, as in this case, the prisoner appears to have resented the blow by using a weapon calculated to cause death. Still, however, if there be a provocation by blows, which would not of itself render the killing manslaughter, but it be accompanied by such provocation by means of words and gestures as would be calculated to produce a degree of exasperation equal to that which would be produced by a violent blow, I am not prepared to say that the law will not regard these circumstances as reducing the crime to that of manslaughter only' (l).

There being an affray in the street, S., a soldier, ran hastily towards the combatants. A woman seeing him run in that manner, cried out, 'You will not murder the man, will you?' S. replied, 'What is that to do with you, you bitch?' The woman thereupon gave him a box on the ear, and S. struck her on the breast with the pommel of his sword. The woman then fled; and S., pursuing her, stabbed her in the back. Holt, C.J., thought that this was murder, a single box on the ear from a woman not being a sufficient provocation to kill in such a manner, after S. had given her a blow in return for the box on the ear; and it was proposed to have the matter found specially. But it afterwards appearing, in the progress of the trial, that the woman struck the soldier in the face with an iron patten, and drew a great deal of blood, the killing was held to be no more than manslaughter (m), as the smart of the man's wound, and the effusion of blood, might possibly have kept his indignation boiling to the moment of the fact (n).

Upon an indictment for murder by strangling, it appeared that the prisoner had said, ' We quarrelled about some money I had won from him ; he wanted it back, and I would not give it to him ; he struck me, and I knocked him down ; he got up, and I knocked him down again, and kicked him, and then I put a rope round his neck, and dragged him into the ditch.' Patteson, J., said to the jury, ' If you even believe the prisoner's statement, that will not prevent the crime from being murder, and reduce it to manslaughter. If two persons fight, and one of them overpowers the other, and knocks him down, and then puts a rope round his neck, and strangles him, that is murder. The act is so wilful and deliberate that nothing can justify it ' (o).

Where a sergeant in the army laid hold of a fifer, and insisted upon carrying him to prison : the fifer resisted, and whilst the sergeant had hold of him to force him, he drew the sergeant's sword, plunged it into his body, and killed him. The sergeant had no right to make the arrest, except under the articles of war : and the articles of war were not given in evidence. Buller, J., considered it in two lights : first, if the sergeant had authority ; and, secondly, if he had not, on the account of the coolness, deliberation, and reflection with which the stab was given. The jury found the prisoner guilty (p).

A drummer and a private soldier were pressed by one M. to enlist him, and gave him a shilling for that purpose ; but they had no authority to enlist anybody. M. wanted afterwards to go away ; but they would not let him, and a crowd collected. The drummer drew his sword, stood in the doorway of the room where they were, and swore he would stab any one who offered to go away. The landlord, however, got by him ; and the landlord's son seized his arm in which the sword was, and was wresting the sword from him, when the private, who had been struggling with M., came behind the son, and stabbed him in the back. He was indicted for stabbing with intent to murder, &c., and it was urged for the prisoner, that the soldiers had a right to enlist M., and to detain him ; and that if death had ensued, the offence would not have been murder ; but, upon the point being saved, the judges were all of a contrary opinion (q).

Two soldiers came at eleven o'clock at night to a publican's, and demanded beer, which he refused. An hour and a half later, when the door was opened, one of them rushed in, the other remaining without, and renewed his demand for beer ; to which the landlord returned the same answer ; and on his refusing to depart, and insisting on having beer, and offering to lay hold of the landlord, the latter at the same instant collared him ; the one pushing and the other pulling each other towards the outer door, where when the landlord came he received a violent blow on the head with some sharp instrument from the other soldier, who had remained without, which occasioned his death a few days afterwards. Buller, J., held this to be murder in both, notwithstanding the previous struggle between the landlord and one of them. For the landlord did no more in attempting to put the soldier out of his house at that time of the night, and after the warning he had given him, than he lawfully might ; which was no provocation for the cruel revenge taken ; more especially as there was reasonable evidence of the prisoners having come the second time with a deliberate intention to use personal violence, in case their demand for beer was not complied with (r).

In cases of provocation, not amounting to assault, the material question is, whether malice must be inferred from the sort of punishment inflicted, from the nature of the instrument used, and from the manner of the chastisement (s) ; for if, on any sudden provocation of a slight nature, one person beats another in a cruel and unusual manner, so that he dies, it is murder by express malice ; though the person so beating the other did not intend to kill him (t).

One F., a soldier, was in a public-house, and asked a girl to drink with him : upon which one A. S., with whom he had cohabited, seized his pot, abused him very much, and threw down his beer. F. then caught the pot from her, and struck her twice on the head with it : the blood gushed out, and she was taken to a hospital, where the wound was examined, and did not appear dangerous, being about a quarter of an inch deep : but it produced an erysipelas, which caused an inflammation of the brain, and the woman died. The witness, who saw the blows, did not think the prisoner intended to do the woman any grievous bodily harm. Gibbs, C.B., after telling the jury that if the disease which caused the death originated from the wound, it was the same as if the wound had caused the death ; that the primary cause was to be considered (tt) ; went on to say that the aggravation, though not constituting a provocation which would extenuate the giving a deadly blow, would palliate the giving a moderate blow ; and left it to the jury whether those blows were such as were likely to be followed by death, or by a disease likely to terminate in death. The jury thought that the blows were not of this kind, and the prisoner was found guilty of manslaughter only (u).

If, without adequate provocation, a person strikes another with a deadly weapon, likely to occasion death, although he had no previous malice against the party, yet he is to be presumed to have had such malice at the moment from the circumstances, and he is guilty of murder (v). Where, therefore, a boy, twelve years old, who had been in the habit of going to a cooper's shop and taking away chips, was told one morning by the cooper's apprentice not to come again ; he however went again in the afternoon, and the apprentice spread his arms out to prevent his reaching the spot where he usually gathered the chips, on which the boy started off, and in passing a work bench, took up a whittle (a sharp-pointed steel knife with a long handle) and threw it at the apprentice, and the blade of the whittle entered his body, to the depth of four inches, and caused his death; the jury having found him guilty upon an indictment for manslaughter, Hullock, B., observed, that had he been indicted for murder, the evidence would have sustained the charge (w). So where on an indictment for wounding it appeared that W. and two women met the prisoner at midnight on the highway, and some words passed between them, when W. struck the prisoner, who then made a blow with a knife, it was held that unless the prisoner apprehended robbery or some similar offence, or danger to life or some serious bodily harm, not simply being knocked down, he would not be justified in using the knife in self-defence (x).

Nature of the Instrument used.—The nature of the instrument used was much considered in Rowley's case (y): The prisoner's son fought with another boy, and was beaten; he ran home to his father all bloody, who presently took a cudgel, ran three quarters of a mile, and struck the other boy upon the head, upon which he died (z). This was ruled manslaughter, because done in a sudden heat of passion; but upon this case Foster, J., makes the following remarks (a):—'Surely the provocation was not very grievous. The boy had fought with one who happened to be an over-match for him, and was worsted; a disaster slight enough, and very frequent among boys. If upon this provocation the father, after running three quarters of a mile, had set his strength against the child, had despatched him with a hedge stake, or any other deadly weapon, or by repeated blows with his cudgel, it must, in my opinion, have been murder; since any of these circumstances would have been a plain indication of malice; but with regard to these circumstances, with what weapon, or to what degree, the child was beaten, Coke is totally silent. But Croke (b) sets the case in a much clearer light, and at the same time leads his readers into the true grounds of the judgment. His words are, "Rowley struck the child with a little cudgel, of which stroke he afterwards died." I think it may be fairly collected from Croke's manner of speaking and Godbolt's report (c), that the accident happened by a single stroke with a cudgel not likely to destroy, and that death did not immediately ensue. The stroke was given in heat of blood, and not with any of the circumstances which import malice, and therefore manslaughter. I observe that Lord Raymond lays great stress on this circumstance: that the stroke was with a cudgel, not likely to kill' (d).

And where the prisoner had struck a boy, his servant, with one of his clogs, because he had not cleaned them, it was held to be only manslaughter, because the prisoner could not, from the instrument he had used, have had any intention to take the boy's life (e).

On an indictment for wounding with a tin can, with which the prisoner had struck the prosecutor four times on the head, Alderson, B., directed the jury to consider, 'whether the instrument employed was, in its ordinary use, likely to cause death; or, though an instrument unlikely, under ordinary circumstances, to cause death; whether it was used in such an extraordinary manner as to make it likely to cause death, either by continued blows or otherwise? A tin can, in its ordinary use, was not likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm; but if the prisoner struck the prosecutor repeated blows on the head with it, you will say, whether he did this merely to hurt the prosecutor, and give him pain, as by giving him a black eye or a bloody nose, or whether he did it to do him some substantial grievous bodily harm. When a deadly weapon, such as a knife, a sword, or gun, is used, the intent of the party is manifest; but where an instrument like the present is used, you must consider, whether the mode in which it was used satisfactorily shews that the prisoner intended to inflict some serious or grievous bodily harm with it' (f).

Upon an indictment for murder, it appeared that a body of persons were committing a riot, and the constables interfering for the purpose of dispersing the crowd, and apprehending the offenders, the mob offered resistance, and one of the constables was beaten severely. The prisoners all took part in the violence used; some by beating him with sticks, some by throwing stones, and others by striking him with their fists; of this aggregate violence, the constable afterwards died. Alderson, B., said, 'The principles on which this case will turn, are these:—If a person attacks another without justifiable cause, and from the violence used death ensues, the question which arises is, whether it be murder or manslaughter? If the weapon used were a deadly weapon, it is reasonable to infer that the party intended death; and if he intended death, and death was the consequence of his act, it is murder. If no weapon was used, then the question usually is, was there excessive violence? If the evidence as to this be such as that the jury think there was an intention to kill, it is murder; if not, manslaughter. Thus, if there were merely a blow with a fist, and death ensued, it would not be reasonable to infer that there was an intention to kill; in that case, therefore, it is manslaughter. But if a strong man attacks a weak one, though no weapon be used, or if, after such injury by beating, the violence is still continued, then the question is whether this excess does not shew a general brutality, and a purpose to kill, and if so, it is murder. Again, if the weapon used be not deadly, e.g. a stick, then the same question as above will arise as to the purpose to kill; and in any case if the nature of the violence, and the continuance of it be such, as that a rational man would conclude that death must follow from the acts done, then it is reasonable for a jury to infer that the party who did them intended to kill, and to find him guilty of murder. Again, it is a principle of law, that if several persons act together in pursuance of a common intent, every act done in furtherance of such intent by each of them is, in law, done by all. The

C.J., said, that it was an unlikely thing to kill the boy. See R. v. Wiggs, 1 Leach, 378 (n), post, p. 768. If, however, the instrument used is so improper as manifestly to endanger life, it seems that the intention of the party to kill will be implied from that circumstance.

act, however, must be in pursuance of the common intent. Thus, if several were to intend and agree together to frighten a constable, and one were to shoot him through the head, such an act would affect the individual only by whom it was done. Here, therefore, in considering this case, you must determine, whether all these prisoners had the common intent of attacking the constables; if so, each of them is responsible for all the acts of all the others done for that purpose; and if all the acts done by each, if done by one man, would together shew such violence, and so long continued, that from them you would infer an intention to kill the constable, it will be murder in them all. If you would not infer such purpose, you ought to find them guilty only of manslaughter' (g).

Slight Provocation.—In some instances slight provocations have been considered to extenuate the guilt of homicide, upon the ground that the conduct of the party killing upon such provocations may fairly be attributed to an intention to chastise, rather than to a cruel and implacable malice. But it must appear that the punishment was not administered with brutal violence, nor greatly disproportionate to the offence; and that the instrument was not such as, from its nature, was likely to endanger life (h).

If it may be reasonably collected from the weapon made use of, or from any other circumstance, that the party intended to kill, or to do some great bodily harm, such homicide will be murder. Accordingly, where a parker, finding a boy stealing wood in his master's ground, bound him to his horse's tail and beat him, and the horse taking fright, and running away, the boy was dragged on the ground till his shoulder was broken, whereof he died; it was ruled murder: for it was not only an illegal, but a deliberate and dangerous act; the correction was excessive and savoured of cruelty (i).

Where a person whose pocket had been picked, encouraged by a concourse of people, threw the pickpocket into an adjoining pond, in order to avenge the theft by ducking him, but without any apparent intention to take away his life, and the pickpocket was drowned, the offence was ruled to be only manslaughter (j).

Where A. finding a trespasser upon his land, in the first transport of his passion, beat him and unluckily killed him, and it was held to be manslaughter (k), it must be understood that he beat the trespasser, not with a mischievous intention, but merely to chastise him, and to deter him from repeating the trespass. For if A. had knocked his brains out with a bill or hedge stake, or had killed him by an outrageous beating with an ordinary cudgel, beyond the bounds of a sudden resentment, it would have been murder (l). M. having been greatly annoyed by persons trespassing upon his farm, repeatedly gave notice that he would shoot anyone who did so, and at length discharged a pistol at a trespasser, and wounded him in the thigh, which led to erysipelas, and the man died: M. was convicted of murder (m).

As trespass against the property of another is not such provocation as will warrant the owner in making use of a deadly or dangerous weapon ; more particularly if such violence is used after the trespass has ceased. But if the beating is with an instrument, or in a manner not likely to kill, it will only amount to manslaughter : and it is lawful to use against a trespasser, who comes without any colour, to take the goods of another, such force as is necessary to make him desist (n).

A man is not authorised to fire a pistol on every forcible and nocturnal intrusion or invasion of his dwelling-house. In R. v. Meade (o) M., who was indicted for murder, had made himself obnoxious to some boatmen, by giving information of smuggling transactions, in which some of them had been engaged ; and they, in revenge, ducked him, and were in the act of throwing him into the sea, when he was rescued by the police ; the boatmen, however, as he was going away, called to him that they would come at night, and pull his house down. In the middle of the night a great number of persons came about his house, singing songs of menace, and using violent language, indicating that they had come with no friendly or peaceable intention. M., under apprehension, as he alleged, that his life and property were in danger, fired a pistol, by which one of the party was killed. Holroyd, J., said to the jury, ' A civil trespass will not excuse the firing a pistol at a trespasser, in sudden resentment or anger. If a person take forcible possession of another man's close, so as to be guilty of a breach of the peace, it is more than a trespass ; so if a man with force invades and enters into the dwelling of another ; but a man is not authorised to fire a pistol on every intrusion or invasion of his house : he ought, if he has a reasonable opportunity, to endeavour to remove him without having recourse to the last extremity : but the making an attack upon a dwelling, and especially at night, the law regards as equivalent to an assault upon a man's person, for a man's house is his castle : and, therefore, in the eye of the law, it is equivalent to an assault ; but no words or singing are equivalent to an assault, nor will they authorise an assault in return. If you are satisfied that there was nothing but the song, and no appearance of further violence : if you believe that there was no reasonable ground for apprehending further danger, but that the pistol was fired for the purpose of killing, then it is murder. There are cases where a person, in the heat of blood, kills another, that the law does not deem it murder, but lowers the offence to manslaughter ; as, where a party coming up, by way of making an attack, and, without there being any previous apprehension of danger, the party attacked, instead of having recourse to a more reasonable and less violent mode of averting it, having an opportunity so to do, fires on the impulse of the moment. If you are of opinion that the prisoner was really attacked, and that the deceased and his party were on the point of breaking in, or likely to do so, and execute the threats of the day before, he was, perhaps, justified in firing as he did ' (p).

(p) In R. v. Symondson, 60 J. P. 645, on an indictment for manslaughter, Kennedy, J., told the jury ' With reference to the defence that the prisoner was acting in

A person must only use so much force as is reasonably necessary in order to turn a mere trespasser out of his house. Upon an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that the prisoner, upon returning home, found the deceased in his house, and desired him to withdraw, but he refused to go : upon this, words arose between them, and the prisoner, becoming excited, proceeded to use force, and, by a kick which he gave to the deceased, caused his death. Alderson, B., said : ‘ A kick is not a justifiable mode of turning a man out of your house, though he be a trespasser. If a person becomes excited, and gives another a kick, it is an unjustifiable act. If the deceased would not have died but for the injury he received, the prisoner, having unlawfully caused that injury, is guilty of manslaughter ’ (g).

Upon an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that a man and his servant had insisted upon placing corn in the prisoner’s barn, which she refused to allow ; they exerted force : a scuffle took place, in which the prisoner received a blow on the breast, whereon she threw a stone at the deceased, the master, which killed him. Holroyd, J., said : ‘ The case fails, as it appears the deceased received the blow in an attempt to invade the prisoner’s barn against her will. She had a right to defend her barn, and to employ such force as was reasonably necessary for that purpose ; and she is not answerable for any unforeseen accident that may have happened in so doing ’ (r).

Where a man finds another in the act of adultery with his wife, and kills him or her (s) in the first transport of passion, he is only guilty of manslaughter (t), for the provocation is grievous, such as the law reasonably concludes cannot be borne in the first transport of passion. But, killing an adulterer deliberately, and upon revenge, would be murder (u). So it seems that if a father were to see a person in the act of committing an unnatural offence with his son, and were instantly to kill him, it would be only manslaughter ; but if he only hears of it from others, and goes in search of the person afterwards, and kills him, when there has been time for the blood to cool, it will be murder (v).

Upon an indictment for murder, Rolfe, B., in summing up, said, ‘ To take away the life of a woman, even your own wife, because you suspect that she has been engaged in some illicit intrigue, would be murder ’ (w).

Where a man was charged with the murder of his son-in-law, who had assaulted the prisoner’s daughter in his presence in a violent manner, although not in a manner to endanger life, Cockburn, C.J., seemed to think that the offence might be reduced to manslaughter, and the prisoner was found guilty of that offence only (x).

defence of his property, in my judgment, the infliction of death must be to prevent no ordinary crime, it must be a crime of a serious and also felonious nature. You must not shoot a trespasser merely because he is a trespasser. If he shews an intention to accomplish a felonious purpose by force, extreme measures may be used.’ See R. v. Dennis, 69 J. On the indictment of a husband for murdering his wife, it appeared that words had passed between them, and that the husband took a knife, and in a struggle stabbed the wife. For the defence, witnesses were called to shew that the wife had been in the habit of making violent attacks upon her husband, seizing him by the neckerchief and twisting it tight so as almost to strangle him, and cause the bystanders to interfere and also that the prisoner had abscesses on his neck, which would render him particularly sensitive to such assaults. Byles, J., after consulting Bramwell, B., admitted the evidence, but said it must be confined to explaining the nature of this particular attack (y).

Provocation no Defence where Express Malice.—The plea of provocation will not avail where express malice is proved (z).

The prisoner, with the deceased, who was his brother, and some neighbours, were drinking in a friendly manner at a public-house ; till, growing warm in liquor, but not intoxicated, the prisoner and the deceased played at cudgels by agreement. The prisoner in the cudgel-play gave the deceased a smart blow on the temple. The deceased thereupon grew angry ; and throwing away his cudgel, closed in with the prisoner, and they fought a short space in good earnest : but the company interposing they were soon parted. The prisoner then quitted the room in anger ; and when he got into the street, he was heard to say, ‘ Damnation seize me if I do not fetch something, and stick him ! ’ And being reproved for using such expressions, he answered, ‘ I ’ll be damned to all eternity if I do not fetch something and run him through the body ! ’ In about half an hour the prisoner returned. The door of the room being open into the street, the prisoner stood leaning against the door-post, his left hand in his bosom, and a cudgel in his right. The deceased invited him into the company ; but the prisoner answered, ‘ I will not come in. ’ ‘ Why will you not ? ’ said the deceased. The prisoner replied, ‘ Perhaps you will fall on me and beat me. ’ The deceased assured him he would not ; and added, ‘ Besides, you think yourself as good a man as me at cudgels, perhaps you will play at cudgels with me. ’ The prisoner answered, ‘ I am not afraid to do so, if you will keep off your fists. ’ Upon these words the deceased got up and went towards the prisoner, who dropped the cudgel as the deceased was coming up to him. The deceased took up the cudgel, and with it gave the prisoner two blows on the shoulder. The prisoner immediately put his right hand into his bosom, and drew out the blade of a tuck sword, crying, ‘ Damn you, stand off, or I ’ll stab you ; ’ and immediately, without giving the deceased time to step back, made a pass at him with the sword, but missed him. The deceased thereupon gave back a little ; and the prisoner shortening the sword in his hand, leaped forward toward the deceased and stabbed him to the heart, and he instantly died. The judges unanimously agreed that there were in this case so many circumstances of deliberate malice and deep revenge on the defendant’s part, that his offence could not be less than wilful murder. He vowed he would fetch something to stick him, to run him through the body. Whom did he mean by him ? Every circumstance in the case shewed that he meant his brother. He returned to the company, provided, to appearance, with an ordinary cudgel, as if he intended to try skill and manhood a second time with that weapon: but the deadly weapon was all the while carefully concealed under his coat; which most probably he had changed for the purpose of concealing the weapon. He stood at the door, refusing to come nearer, but artfully drew on the discourse of the past quarrel; and as soon as he saw his brother disposed to engage a second time at cudgels, he dropped his cudgel and betook him to the deadly weapon, which till that moment he had concealed. He did indeed bid his brother stand off: but he gave him no opportunity of doing so before the first pass was made. His brother retreated before the second: but he advanced as fast, and took the revenge he had vowed. The circumstance of the blows before the sword was produced, which probably occasioned the doubt, did not alter the case, nor did the precedent quarrel; because, all circumstances considered, he appeared to have returned with a deliberate resolution to take a deadly revenge for what had passed: and the blows were plainly a provocation sought of his part, that he might execute the wicked purpose of his heart with some colour of excuse (a).

It was considered that the blows with the cudgel were a provocation sought by the prisoner, to give occasion and pretence for the dreadful vengeance which he meditated: and where the provocation is sought by the party killing, and induced by his own act, in order to afford him a pretence for wreaking his malice, it will in no case extenuate the killing (b). Thus where A. and B. having fallen out, A. said he would not strike, but would give B. a pot of ale to strike him; upon which B. did strike, and A. killed him, it was held to be murder (c). So where A. and B. were at some difference; A. bade B. take a pin out of his (A.'s) sleeve, intending to take the occasion to strike or wound B.; B. accordingly took out the pin, and A. struck him and killed him; and this was ruled murder: first, because it was no provocation when B. did it by the consent of A.; and, secondly, because it appeared to be a malicious and deliberate artifice, by which to take occasion to kill B. (d).

Where upon an indictment for maliciously wounding under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31 (rep.), it appeared that some words passed between the prisoner and a third person, after which he walked up and down the passage of the house with a sword-stick in his hand, with the blade open, and was heard to say, 'If any man strikes me I will make him repent it.' He was desired to put up the stick, which he refused to do; and shortly after the prosecutor, ignorant of what had occurred, but perceiving the prisoner was creating a disturbance, struck the prisoner twice with his fists, when the prisoner stabbed him. Parke, B., told the jury, 'If a person receives a blow, and immediately avenges it with any instrument that he may happen to have in his hand, then the offence will be only manslaughter, provided the blow is to be attributed to the passion of anger arising from that previous provocation; for anger is a passion to which good and bad men are both subject. But the law requires two things : first that there should be that provocation ; and secondly, that the fatal blow should be clearly traced to the influence of passion arising from that provocation (e). There is no doubt here, but that a violent assault was committed ; but the question is, whether the blow given by the prisoner was produced by the passion of anger excited by that assault ? If you see that a person denotes, by the manner in which he avenges a previous blow, that he is not excited by a sudden transport of passion, but under the influence of that wicked disposition, that bad spirit, which the law terms “ malice,” in the definition of wilful murder, then the offence would not be manslaughter. Suppose, for instance, a blow were given, and the party struck beat the other’s head to pieces by continued, cruel, and repeated blows ; then you could not attribute that act to the passion of anger, and the offence would be murder. And so, if you find that before the stroke is given, there is a determination to punish any man, who gives a blow, with such an instrument as the one which the prisoner used : because if you are satisfied that before the blow was given the prisoner meant to give a wound with such an instrument, it is impossible to attribute the giving such wound to the passion of anger excited by that blow ; for no man who was under proper feelings, none but a bad man of a wicked and cruel disposition, would really determine beforehand to resent a blow with such an instrument’ (f).

On a trial for murder, where the deceased had died from a stab given by the prisoner, in a contest with the deceased, Bosanquet, J., told the jury, ‘ The question for you, on a careful consideration of the whole evidence, will be, whether the prisoner was guilty of either murder or manslaughter, or whether the circumstances of the case were such as to entitle him to an acquittal ; whether he is guilty of murder or manslaughter, or whether his act was justifiable or excusable. Upon the question of whether it amounts to murder you have to consider this ; did the prisoner enter into a contest with an unarmed man, intending to avail himself of a deadly weapon ? For if he did, it will amount to murder. But if he did not enter into the contest with an intention of using it, then the question will be, did he use it in the heat of passion in consequence of an attack made upon him ? If he did, then it will be manslaughter. But there is another question, did he use the weapon in defence of his life ? Before a person can avail himself of that defence, he must satisfy the jury that that defence was necessary ; that he did all he could to avoid it ; and that it was necessary to protect his own life, or to protect himself from such serious bodily harm as would give a reasonable apprehension that his life was in immediate danger. If he used the weapon, having no other means of resistance, and no means of escape, in such case, if he retreated as far as he could, he will be justified’ (g).

This direction was followed in R. v. Symondson (h), an indictment for manslaughter, where one of the defences was that the prisoner was acting in defence of his own life.

On an indictment for murder it appeared that the prisoner and his wife, who had been to look for him, came home about midnight ; he was not sober, and she upbraided him for staying out so late : he took some money out, and she said he could treat other persons and not her ; he then took down a sword from a shelf, pulled it out of the sheath, and struck her on the back with the flat part of it ; her daughter ran to the door ; the mother attempted to follow her, and her daughter took hold of her hand to pull her through ; the father, according to the daughter's first account, went to his wife at the door, and ran the sword into her left side ; but it appeared that she could not see the actual thrust : a wound nine inches long was found in the left side which caused the death. She stated in her husband's presence that he had done it with a sword. The authorities cited ante, p. 656, having been referred to, Cresswell, J., after referring to them said : ' This is expressed more intelligibly by Littledale, J., who says that " malice, in its legal sense, denotes a wrongful act, done intentionally, without just cause or excuse " (i). Therefore, if you think the prisoner used the weapon wilfully, then that is such malice as the law requires. The great question for your consideration is whether the wound was given wilfully. If done by the accident of the woman rushing on the sword, the prisoner would not be responsible. If you can find any evidence that he used the sword carelessly, and that, without intending to inflict a wound, he caused it, then he is guilty of manslaughter ; but if he used it intending to inflict a wound, then he is guilty of murder. When there is a contest the law makes great allowances for blows and a personal encounter, but not for words (j). If, therefore, in consequence of words, the prisoner was provoked, and intended to do the deceased a grievous injury, that is no justification or alleviation of the offence. There is no evidence of any conflict or of any provocation in law. If the prisoner used the sword intending to do a serious injury, that is such evidence of malice as the law holds to be murder. If the deceased rushed upon it, then it was an accident, and he is not guilty. If the wound was inflicted in a struggle without any intention on the part of the prisoner to use it, then there was such a careless use of it as to make him guilty of manslaughter ' (k).

Provocation will not Avail if there is time for Cooling.—In every case of homicide upon provocation, how great the provocation may have been, if there has been sufficient time for passion to subside and reason to interpose, such homicide will be murder (l). Thus even where a man finds another in the act of adultery with his wife, though it would be only manslaughter if he should kill the adulterer in the first transport of passion, yet if he kills him deliberately, and upon revenge after the fact and sufficient cooling time, it would undoubtedly be murder (m). ' For let it be observed, that in all possible cases, deliberate homicide upon a principle of revenge is murder. No man under the protection of the law is to be the avenger of his own wrongs. If they are of a nature for which the laws of society will give him an adequate remedy, thither he ought to resort :

but be they of what nature soever, he ought to bear his lot with patience, and remember that vengeance belongeth only to the Most High' (n). With respect to the interval of time to be allowed for passion to subside, it is much more easy to lay down rules for determining what cases are without the limits, than how far exactly those limits extend (o). The immediate question is, whether the suspension of reason arising from sudden passion continued from the time of the provocation received to the very instant of the mortal stroke given; for if from any circumstance whatever it appears that the party reflected, deliberated, or cooled at any time before the fatal stroke was given; or if in legal presumption there was time or opportunity for cooling; the killing is murder, as being attributable to malice and revenge, rather than to human frailty (p). It was at one time held that the question whether the blood has had time to cool or not was a question for the Court and not for the jury (q). But doubt is thrown on this view by the following cases:—

On an indictment for murder, it appeared that the prisoner and the deceased, who had been upon terms of intimacy for three or four years, had been drinking together at a public-house till about twelve o'clock at night; about one they were together in the street, and had some words, and a scuffle ensued, during which the deceased struck the prisoner in the face with his fist, and gave him a black eye. The prisoner called for the police, and on a policeman coming, went away; he, however, returned again, between five and ten minutes afterwards, and stabbed the deceased with a knife on the left side of the abdomen: the knife, a common bread-and-cheese knife, was one that the prisoner was in the habit of carrying about with him, and he was rather weak in his intellect, but not so much so as not to know right from wrong. Tenterden, C.J., said to the jury: 'It is not every slight provocation, even by a blow, which will, when the party receiving it strikes with a deadly weapon, reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter; but it depends upon the time elapsing between the blow and the injury; and also whether the injury was inflicted with an instrument at the moment in the possession of the party, or whether he went to fetch it from another place. It is uncertain, in this case, how long the prisoner was absent; the witness says from five to ten minutes, according to the best of his knowledge. Unless attention is particularly called to it, it seems to me that evidence of time is very uncertain; the prisoner may have been absent less than five minutes; there is no evidence that he went anywhere for the knife. The father says it was a knife he carried about with him; it was a common knife, such as a man in the prisoner's situation in life might have; for aught that appears he might have gone a little way from the deceased and then returned, still smarting under the blow he had received. You will also take into consideration the previous habits and connection of the deceased and the prisoner with respect to each other; if there had been any old grudge between them, then the crime which the prisoner committed might be murder. But it seems they had been long in habits of intimacy, and on the very night in question, about an hour before the blow, they had been drinking in a friendly way together. If you think that there was not time and interval sufficient for the passion of a man proved to be of no very strong intellect, to cool, and for reason to regain her dominion over his mind, then you will say that the prisoner is guilty only of manslaughter. But if you think that the act was the act of a wicked, malicious and diabolical mind (which, under the circumstances, I should think you hardly would), then you will find him guilty of murder' (r).

The prisoner and the deceased, who were strangers, met at a public-house with others, and sat there drinking and wrangling until midnight, when they were all turned out. In consequence of some trivial quarrel about a game, the deceased struck the prisoner a blow on the face with his open hand, saying, 'that if he did not like it he might return it.' The prisoner said he was not in a fit state to fight, and the men stood wrangling some interval of time, which was described by some of the witnesses as 'about ten minutes.' Then the two men shook hands and parted, the prisoner going towards home. When he had gone about thirty yards he stopped, turned round, and cried out, 'Now I am on the highway; if anybody wants anything I am ready for him.' The deceased appeared to have taken this as a kind of challenge to himself, and at all events accepted it as such, and went after the prisoner, who had stood still. Almost immediately afterwards the deceased was heard to cry out, 'I am stabbed,' and was found lying on the ground, his jacket off, and in the hands of the prisoner who was standing by; and a mortal wound in his abdomen, which was no doubt inflicted by the prisoner, who said, 'I shouldn't have done it if he hadn't hit me on the face.' When the dying deposition of deceased was taken, he declared that on the second occasion he had not struck the prisoner; and when the prisoner said to him, 'Didn't you knock me down?' the dying man denied it. Hannen, J., in the course of his summing up to the jury, said: 'In the present instance the evidence as to the time which had elapsed is left in some uncertainty; but several witnesses say it was "about ten minutes." It is for you to form your own conclusion as to what took place in the interval, as to which you can only draw inferences from the circumstances; and though there is no express evidence of a renewal of the aggression on the part of the deceased (and the evidence is rather against the supposition, especially as the prisoner did not accuse him of it at the time), it is beyond a doubt that he followed the prisoner with the intention of renewing the attack, and his jacket was found off. It is for you to draw such inferences from this as you think warranted by the evidence. If you come to the conclusion that the prisoner, after the blow had been given, had time for his blood to cool, and that when he stopped on the road he had the intention in his mind to use the knife in the event of the deceased following him, and uttered the words he used with the object of inducing the deceased to follow him, there would be evidence of implied malice to sustain the charge of murder. But if you come to the conclusion that the prisoner had not such intention in his mind, and that he did not utter the words with such intention, that they were idle words of bravado, not of challenge, and that he used the knife on some fresh and sudden provocation, ensuing from the deceased following him and renewing the assault upon him, then there is evidence to reduce the crime to manslaughter^(s).

The deceased was requested by his mother to turn the prisoner out of her house, which after a short struggle with the prisoner he effected, and in doing so he gave him one kick. The prisoner said he would make him remember it, and instantly went to his own lodgings, from two to three hundred yards distant, passed through his bedroom and a kitchen into a pantry, and returned thence hastily back again. Within five minutes after the prisoner had left the deceased, the latter followed him to give him back his hat, which had been left behind, and they met about ten yards from the prisoner's lodgings. They stopped for a short time, when they were heard talking together, but without any words of anger; after they had walked on together for about fifteen yards, the deceased gave the prisoner his hat, when the latter exclaimed with an oath, that he would have his rights, and instantly stabbed the deceased with a knife or some sharp instrument, in two places, giving him a mortal wound. As soon as he had stabbed him the second time, he said he had served him right, and instantly ran back to his lodgings, passed hastily through his bedroom and the kitchen to the pantry, and thence back to his bedroom, where he undressed himself and went to bed. Shortly afterwards he was apprehended, and no knife or other instrument found upon him. In the pantry the prisoner had four. The several knives were found the next morning in their usual places in the pantry. Tindal, C.J., told the jury that the question for them was, whether the wound was given by the prisoner while smarting under a provocation so recent and so strong that the prisoner might not be considered at the moment the master of his own understanding: or whether there had been time for the blood to cool, and for reason to resume its seat, before the wound was given. That in determining this question, the most favourable circumstance for the prisoner was the shortness of time between the original quarrel and the stabbing; but, on the other hand, the weapon was not at hand when the quarrel took place, but was sought for from a distant place. It would be for them to say whether the prisoner had shewn thought, contrivance, and design in the mode of possessing himself of the weapon, and again replacing it immediately after the blow was struck; for the exercise of contrivance and design denoted rather the presence of judgment and reason than of violent and ungovernable passion (t).

From the cases which have been stated in the former part of this section, it appears that malice will be presumed, even though the act be perpetrated recently after the provocation received, if the instrument or manner of retaliation be greatly inadequate to the offence given, and cruel and dangerous in its nature; for the law supposes that a party capable of acting in so outrageous a manner upon a slight provocation must have entertained a general, if not a particular malice, and have previously determined to inflict such vengeance upon any pretence that offered (u).

SECT. VII.—MUTUAL COMBAT (v).

Where words of reproach or other sudden provocations have led to blows and mutual combat, and death has ensued, the important question is, whether the occasion was altogether sudden, and not the result of preconceived anger or malice ; for the killing, though in mutual combat, will not admit of alleviation, if the fighting were upon malice (w).

Thus a person who killed another in a deliberate duel is guilty of murder ; for wherever two in cold blood meet and fight on a precedent quarrel, and one of them is killed, the other is guilty of murder (x), and cannot extenuate the killing by alleging that he was first struck by the deceased ; or that he had often declined to meet him, and was prevailed upon to do it by his importunity ; or that it was his intent only to vindicate his reputation (y) ; or that he meant not to kill, but only to disarm his adversary (z). He was deliberately engaged in an act, highly unlawful, in defiance of the law, and he must at his peril abide the consequences. Upon this principle, wherever two persons quarrel overnight and appoint to fight the next day, or quarrel in the morning and agree to fight in the afternoon, or at any time afterwards so considerable that in common intendment it must be presumed that the blood was cooled, the person killing will be guilty of murder (a). And where, upon a quarrel happening at a tavern, M. objected to fighting at that time, on account of the disadvantage he should have by reason of the height of his shoes, and presently afterwards went into a field and fought, the circumstance was relied on as shewing that he did not fight in the first passion (b). So wherever there is an act of deliberation, and a meeting by compact, such mutual combat will not excuse the party killing from the guilt of murder ; as where B. challenged A., and A. refused to meet him, but in order to evade the law, told B. that he should go the next day to a certain town about his business, and accordingly B. met him the next day in the road to the same town and assaulted him, whereupon they fought, and A. killed B., it is said that A. seems guilty of murder ; but the same conclusion would not follow, if it should appear by the whole circumstances that he gave B. such information accidentally, and not with a design to give him an opportunity of fighting (c). Upon the same principle, if A. and B. meet deliberately to fight, and A. strikes B., and pursues B. so closely that B., in safeguard of his own life, kills A., this is murder in B. ; because their meeting was a compact, and an act of deliberation, in pursuance of which all that follows is presumed to be done (d).

(v) Many of the earlier cases under this head were decided by reference to what was called chance medley or chaude mêlée. See 22 Hen. VIII. c. 14, s. 4, repealed in 1828 by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31. 1 Hawk. c. 30, s. 1. Fost. 275. 1 Hale, 453.

(d) 1 Hale, 452, 480, who says, ' Thus is Mr. Dalton, c. 93, p. 241 (new ed. c. 145, p. 471) to be understood.' But a quære is added in 1 Hale, 452, whether if B. had really and truly declined the fight, run away as far as he could, and offered to yield, and yet A., refusing to decline it, had attempted his death, and B. after this

Not only the principal in a duel in cold blood who actually kills the other, but also his second, and the second of the person killed are guilty of murder (e). On an indictment charging M. with the murder of F. and, the prisoner as present, aiding and assisting in the murder, the death was shewn to have occurred in a duel, in which M. was one of the principals and the prisoner was said to have acted as second to the deceased. The jury were directed that where two persons go out to fight a deliberate duel, and death ensues, all persons who are present on the occasion, encouraging or promoting the death, will be guilty of abetting the principal offender, and that, without giving them any particular name, all persons who were present aiding, assisting, and abetting that deliberate duel were within the terms of the indictment (f).

Mere presence is not sufficient; but if those present sustain the principals by their advice or presence, or if they go for the purpose of encouraging and forwarding the unlawful conflict, although they do not say or do anything, yet if they are present and assisting and encouraging at the moment when the pistol is fired, they are guilty of murder (g).

If, upon a sudden quarrel, the parties fight upon the spot, or if they presently fetch their weapons, and go into a field and fight, and one of them is killed, it will be but manslaughter, because it may be presumed that the blood never cooled (h). And it has been observed, with regard to sudden rencounters, that when they are begun, the blood, previously too much heated, kindles afresh at every pass or blow; and in the tumult of the passions, in which mere instinct, self-preservation, has no inconsiderable share, the voice of reason is not heard: therefore the law, in condensation to the infirmities of flesh and blood, has extenuated the offence (i).

P. with one party, and W. with another party, dined at a tavern; and on coming out P. and W. quarrelled and drew their swords, and W. ran P. through the body, and he died. There was no evidence of any unfair advantage taken by W.; nor could the witnesses say more than that they heard them quarrelling, saw their swords drawn, and the sword through P.'s body; and it appeared that the parties did not know each other before. When P. fell, W. took him by the nape of the neck, had killed A. in his own defence, it would excuse him from the guilt of murder; admitting clearly that if the running away were only a pretence to save his own life, but was really designed to draw out A. to kill him, it would be murder. This quære of Hale's is discussed in 1 East, P. C. 284, et seq., and it is observed that Blackstone (4 Bl. Com. 185) expressly puts the same case of a duel as Hale, but without subjoining the same doubt; and that it was considered as settled law in Major Oney's case. 2 Str. 766; 17 St. Tr. 29; 2 Ld. Raym. 1485, 1489. East, after reasoning in favour of the extenuation of the crime of the duellist so declining to fight, proceeds thus: 'Yet still it may be doubtful whether, admitting the full force of this reasoning, the offence can be less than manslaughter, or whether in such case the party can altogether excuse himself upon the foot of

dashed his head upon the ground, and said, 'Damn you, you are dead !' Jenner, B., told the jury that this was only manslaughter : the jury, however, were disposed to find it murder, because of the dashing the head against the ground, &c. : but Allibone, J., repeated to them that it was manslaughter only, and they found accordingly (j).

B. and C. differed at a club as to the best means of procuring game. C. said, 'If you have anything more to say, you will find me in Berkeley Row.' The conversation then dropped, and they stayed together at least half an hour ; and B. during that time conversed with a gentleman who sat next him : C. settled the bill, but made a mistake which might arise from agitation. C. then went out, and D. followed him, of whom C. asked if he had been short with B. in what he said last to him ; to which D. answered, 'No.' B. then came out and said to C., 'I want to speak to you' ; upon which they both called the waiter, and were shewn into a small room, and the waiter left a candle in the room. B. asked C. if he meant the conversation upon game to Sir C. or to him ; upon which C. said, 'If you have anything to say we had better shut the door, or we shall be heard,' and he shut the door. On turning from the door he saw B.'s sword half drawn, and B. said, 'Draw, draw !' C. drew, and thrust at B. ; and after one or two thrusts, C. received a mortal wound, of which he died. An indictment was preferred for murder ; but upon the trial the peers (123) were unanimous that it was manslaughter only (k).

The deceased, a French prisoner, had stolen a tobacco-box from one of a party of French prisoners who were gambling, and was chastised by some of the party for his conduct, and a clamour was raised against him. As he passed the prisoner, who was sitting at a table and much intoxicated, the prisoner got up, and with great force pushed the deceased backwards upon the ground. The deceased got up again and struck the prisoner two or three blows with his doubled fist in the face, and one blow in the eye ; upon which the prisoner pushed the deceased backwards again in the same manner, and gave him, as he lay on his back upon the ground, two or three stamps with great force with his right foot on the stomach and belly ; and afterwards, when the deceased arose on his seat and was sitting, gave him a strong kick in the face ; the blood came out of the mouth and nose of the deceased, and he fell backwards, and died on the next day. The stamps upon the stomach and belly were the cause of his death. The prisoner was convicted of murder, on the ground that the violence which caused the death was not excused by heat of blood : but on a case reserved the offence was held to be manslaughter only (l).

If A. uses provoking language or behaviour towards B., and B. strikes him, upon which a combat ensues, in which A is killed, this is manslaughter ; for the affray was sudden and the fight upon equal terms ; and in combats, upon sudden quarrels, it matters not who gave the first blow (m). But even in such cases malice may be inferred. Yet if the party killing began the attack with circumstances of undue advantage (n). The party assaulted must be put on an equal footing in point of defence ; at least at the onset : and this more particularly where the attack is made with deadly or dangerous weapons (o). Thus if B. draw his sword and make a pass at A., the sword of A. being then undrawn, and thereupon A. draw his sword and a combat ensue, in which A. is killed, this will be murder ; for B., by making the pass, while his adversary's sword was undrawn, shews that he sought his blood : and A.'s endeavour to defend himself, which he had a right to do, will not excuse B. (p) ; but if B. had forborne till his adversary had drawn too it had been no more than manslaughter (q).

In Mawgridge's case (r), words of anger happening, M. threw a bottle with great force at the head of C., and immediately drew his sword. C. returned a bottle at the head of M., and wounded him ; whereupon M. stabbed C. This was ruled to be murder ; for M., in throwing the bottle, shewed an intention to do some great mischief ; and his drawing immediately shewed that he intended to follow his blow ; and it was lawful for C., being so assaulted, to return the bottle.

Even if the parties are upon an equal footing when the combat begins, malice may be implied from the violent conduct which the party killing pursued in the first instance ; more especially where there is time for cooling, and such expressions are used as manifest deliberation ; as in the case of Major Oneby (s).

He was indicted for the murder of G. ; and a special verdict was found, containing the following statement. The prisoner being in company with the deceased and three other persons at a tavern, in a friendly manner, after some time, began playing at hazard ; when R., one of the company, asked if one would set him three half-crowns ; whereupon the deceased, in a jocular manner, laid down three half-pence, telling R. he had set him three pieces ; and the prisoner at the same time set R. three half-crowns, and lost them to him. Immediately after which, in an angry manner, he turned about to the deceased, and said, it was an impertinent thing to set half-pence, and that he was an impertinent puppy for so doing, to which the deceased answered, whoever called him so was a rascal. Thereupon the prisoner took up a bottle, and with great force threw it at the deceased's head ; but did not hit him, the bottle only brushing some of the powder out of his hair. The deceased in return immediately tossed a candlestick or bottle at the prisoner, which missed him ; upon which they both rose up to fetch their swords, which then hung up in the room, and the deceased drew his sword ; but the prisoner was prevented from drawing his by the company. The deceased thereupon threw away his sword ; and the company interposing, they sat down again for the space of an hour. At the expiration of that time the deceased said to the prisoner : ' We have had hot words, but you were the aggressor ; but I think we may pass it over ' ; and at the same time offered his hand to the prisoner, who made answer, 'No, damn you ; I will have your blood.' After which, the reckoning being paid, all the company, except the prisoner, went out of the room to go home ; and he called to the deceased, saying, 'Young man ! come back ; I have something to say to you' ; whereupon the deceased returned into the room, and the door was closed, and the rest of the company excluded ; but they heard a clashing of swords, and the prisoner gave the deceased the mortal wound. It was also found, that at the breaking up of the company the prisoner had his great coat thrown over his shoulders, and that he received three slight wounds in the fight ; and that the deceased, being asked upon his death-bed, whether he received his wound in a manner among sword-men called fair, answered, 'I think I did.' It was further found that, from the throwing of the bottle, there was no reconciliation between the prisoner and the deceased. Upon these facts all the judges were of opinion that the prisoner was guilty of murder ; he having acted upon malice and deliberation, and not from sudden passion. It should probably be taken, upon the facts found in the verdict and the opinion of the Chief Justice, that, after the door had been shut, the parties were upon an equal footing in point of preparation before the fight began in which the mortal wound was given. The main point then on which the judgment turned, was the evidence of express malice, after the interposition of the company, and that the parties had all sat down again for an hour. Under those circumstances the Court were of opinion that the prisoner had had reasonable time for cooling ; after which, upon an offer of reconciliation from the deceased, he had made use of that bitter and deliberate expression, that he would have his blood. And again, the prisoner remained in the room after the rest of the company retired, and calling back the deceased by the contemptuous appellation of young man, on pretence of having something to say to him, altogether shewed such strong proof of deliberation and coolness as precluded the presumption of passion having continued down to the time of the mortal stroke. Though even that would not have availed the prisoner under these circumstances ; for it must have been implied, according to Mawgridge's case, that he acted upon malice ; having in the first instance, before any provocation received, and without warning or giving time for preparation on the part of G., made a deadly assault upon him.

If, after an interchange of blows on equal terms, one of the parties, suddenly, and without any such intention at the commencement of the affray, snatches up a deadly weapon and kills the other party with it, such killing will be only manslaughter. But if a party, under colour of fighting upon equal terms, uses from the beginning of the contest a deadly weapon without the knowledge of the other party, and kills the other party with such weapon ; or if, at the beginning of the contest he prepares a deadly weapon, so as to have the power of using it in some part of the contest, and uses it accordingly in the course of the combat, and kills the other party with the weapon ; the killing in both these cases will be murder. The prisoner and L. quarrelled and went out to fight. After two rounds, which occupied little more than two minutes, L. was found to be stabbed in a great many places ; and of one of those stabs he almost instantly died. It appeared that nobody could have stabbed him but the prisoner, who had a clasped knife before the affray. Bayley, J., told the jury, that if the prisoner used the knife privately from the beginning ; or if before they began to fight he placed the knife so that he might use it during the affray, and used it accordingly, it was murder ; but that if he took to the knife after the fight began, and without having placed it to be ready during the affray, it was only manslaughter. The jury found the prisoner guilty of murder (t).

Upon an indictment for maliciously cutting, it appeared that the prisoner had cut the prosecutor in a fight that took place between them, but no instrument was seen either before or at the time in the prisoner's hands ; Bayley, J., said : ' When persons fight on fair terms, and merely with fists, where life is not likely to be at hazard, and the blows passing between them are not likely to cause death, if death ensues, it is manslaughter ; and if persons meet originally on fair terms, and after an interval, blows having been given, a party draws in the heat of blood a deadly instrument, and inflicts a deadly injury, it is manslaughter only. But if a party enters into a contest dangerously armed, and fights under an unfair advantage, though mutual blows pass, it is not manslaughter, but murder. If you are of opinion that the prisoner entered into the contest, being unduly armed with an instrument calculated to produce the effects charged in the indictment, and with the instrument ready in this hand, in order that he might resort to it with any of the alleged intents, then he is guilty. For if death had ensued it would have been murder ' (u).

J. T., a Scotch soldier, and two other Scotchmen, were drinking together in an alehouse, when some servants to the owner of the house, who were also drinking in another box, abused the Scotch nation, and used several provoking expressions towards T. and his company, on which T. struck one of the servants with a small rattan cane, not bigger than a man's little finger, and another of the Scotchmen struck the same servant with his fist ; the servant who was struck went out of the room into the yard, to fetch his fellow-servants to turn T. and his company out of the room ; and, in the meantime, an altercation ensued between T. and the deceased, who was the owner of the house, but not the occupier, and who had come into the room after the servant went into the yard. He insisted that T. should pay for his liquor and go out of the house ; and T., after some further altercation, was going away, when the deceased laid hold of him by the collar, and said he should not go away till he had paid for the liquor ; and then threw him down against a settle. T. then paid for the liquor ; whereupon the deceased laid hold of him again by the collar, and shoved him out of the room into the passage ; and T. then said that he did not mind killing an Englishman more than eating a mess of crowdy. The servant, who had been originally struck with the cane, then came and assisted the deceased, who had hold of T.'s collar ; and together they violently pushed him out of the door of the alehouse ; whereupon T. instantly turned round, drew his sword, and gave the deceased the mortal wound. This was adjudged manslaughter (v).

The prisoner, a shoemaker, lived near the deceased. One afternoon the prisoner, very drunk, passed accidentally by the house of the deceased's mother, while the deceased was thatching an adjacent barn. They entered into conversation ; but on the prisoner's abusing the mother and sister of the deceased, very high words arose on both sides, and they placed themselves in a posture to fight. The mother of the deceased, hearing them quarrel, came out of her house, threw water over the prisoner, hit him in the face with her hand, and prevented them from boxing. The prisoner went into his own house ; and in a few minutes came out again, and sat himself down upon a bench before his garden gate, at a small distance from the door of his house, with a shoemaker's knife in his hand, with which he was cutting the heel of a shoe. The deceased, having finished his thatching, was returning, in his way home, by the prisoner's house ; and on passing the prisoner, as he sat on the bench, the deceased called out to him, ' Are not you an aggravating rascal ? ' The prisoner replied, ' What will you be, when you are got from your master's feet ? ' On which the deceased seized the prisoner by the collar, and dragging him off the bench, they both rolled down into the cartway. While they were struggling and fighting, the prisoner underneath, and the deceased upon him, the deceased cried out, ' You rogue, what do you do with that knife in your hand ? ' and made an attempt to secure it ; but the prisoner kept striking about with one hand, and held the deceased so hard with the other hand, that the deceased could not disengage himself. He made, however, a vigorous effort, and by that means drew the prisoner from the ground ; and during this struggle the prisoner gave a blow, on which the deceased immediately exclaimed, ' The rogue has stabbed me to the heart ; I am a dead man ' ; and expired. Upon inspection, it appeared that he had received three wounds, one very small on the right breast ; another on the left thigh, two inches deep, and half an inch wide ; and the mortal wound on the left breast. The jury found implied malice, and convicted of murder. But on a case reserved the judges seem to have thought that there was not sufficient evidence that the prisoner lay in wait for the deceased, with a malicious design to provoke him, and under that colour, to revenge his former quarrel, by stabbing him, which would have made it murder. On the contrary, he had composed himself to work at his own door, in a summer's evening ; and when the deceased passed by, neither provoked him by word nor gesture. The deceased began first by ill language, and afterwards by collaring and dragging him from his seat, and rolling him in the road. The knife was used openly before the deceased came by, and not concealed from the bystanders ; though the deceased in his passion did not perceive it till they were both down. And though the prisoner was not justifiable in using such a weapon on such an occasion, yet it being already in his hand, and the attack upon him very violent and sudden, the judges thought that the offence only amounted to manslaughter (w).

Upon an indictment for maliciously cutting, it appeared that a quarrel arose between the prisoner and the prosecutor, both being intoxicated ; the prosecutor struck the first blow, and they fought for a few minutes, when the prisoner ran back a short distance, and the prosecutor pursued, and overtook him, on which the prisoner, who had taken out his knife in his retreat, gave the prosecutor a cut across the abdomen. J. A. Park, J., said : ' The question I shall leave to the jury is this, whether the prisoner ran back with a malicious intention of getting out his knife to inflict an injury on the prosecutor, and so to gain an advantage in the conflict ? For if he did, notwithstanding the previous fighting between them on equal terms, and the prosecutor having struck the first blow, I am of opinion that if death had ensued, the crime would have been murder ; or whether the prisoner, bona fide, ran away from the prosecutor with intention to escape from an adversary of superior strength, but finding himself pursued, drew his knife to defend himself ? As in this latter case, if the prosecutor had been killed, the crime would have been manslaughter only' (x).

Upon an indictment for manslaughter the evidence was that the prisoner and deceased were ' fighting up and down,' and that the deceased died of the injury he sustained in the fight. Bayley, J., to the jury, ' Fighting up and down is calculated to produce death, and the foot is an instrument likely to produce death. If death happens in a fight of that description it is murder, and not manslaughter.' The prisoner having been convicted, Bayley, J., told him that if he had been charged with murder, the evidence adduced would have sustained the indictment (y).

Though, where there has been an old quarrel between A. and B., and a reconciliation between them, and afterwards, upon a new and sudden falling out, A. kills B., this is not murder ; yet if upon the circumstances it appears that the reconciliation was but pretended or counterfeit, and that the hurt done was upon the score of the old malice, it is murder (z).

On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner, a blind man, and the deceased were at a public-house, and a dispute arose between them. The prisoner went to lay hold of the deceased, who pushed him away ; they then got hold of each other and there was a struggle, and they pushed about from one side to another ; no blows were struck, but there were three falls, and the deceased fell undermost each time, and the third time the prisoner's knees came upon the lower part of the stomach of the deceased, and ruptured the intestines, which rupture caused the death. Patteson, J., told the jury that ' All struggles in anger, whether by fighting, or wrestling, or any other mode—all kinds of contests in anger, are unlawful. And if you think the deceased's death was occasioned by an act of the prisoner in the struggle of that kind, I cannot tell you that it does not amount to manslaughter. If the prisoner was struggling, but did not attempt to throw him, I should tell you it is not a case of manslaughter ; but it is for you to say whether that is the fact or not. If the prisoner laid hold of the deceased in anger, and struggled with him and threw him, then it is a case of manslaughter. If you can collect from the circumstances that the prisoner was pulled down against his will, and, in consequence, fell upon the deceased, then he will not be guilty. But there does not seem anything in the evidence to shew that the prisoner evinced any disposition to give up the contest; on the contrary, it appears that the contest was continued till the fall, which occasioned the death. You have been told by the counsel for the prisoner that you must be satisfied that the death was occasioned by the wilful act of the prisoner. In one sense of the word "wilful" I agree with him. I take it for granted he does not mean by it malicious or intending to do injury, but that it must be an act of the will, and that it must be shewn that the prisoner attempted to throw the deceased. They had no right to struggle in this way; if it had been an amicable contest in wrestling, to see who was the best man, that would be quite a different matter' (a).

A man seems to be guilty of manslaughter, who, seeing two persons fighting together on a private quarrel, whether sudden or malicious, takes part with one of them, and kills the other (b). If a master, maliciously intending to kill another, takes his servants with him without acquainting them with his purpose, and meets his adversary, and fights with him, and the servants, seeing their master engaged, take part with him, and kill the other, they would be guilty of manslaughter only, though the master would be (it seems) guilty of murder (c). From this it follows, a fortiori, that if a servant or friend, or even a stranger, coming suddenly, and seeing A. fighting with another man, sides with A., and kills the other man, or seeing A.'s sword broken sends him another, wherewith he kills the other man, such servant, friend, or stranger will be only guilty of manslaughter (d). But this supposes that the person interfering does not know that the fighting is upon malice; for though if A. and B. fight upon malice, and C., the friend or servant of A., not being acquainted therewith, comes in and takes part against B., and kills him, this (though murder in A.) is only manslaughter in C.; yet it would be otherwise, if C. had known that the fighting was upon malice, for then it would be murder in both. If A., having been assaulted, retreats as far as he can, and then his servant kills the assailant, it will be only homicide se defendendo; but if the servant had killed him before the master had retreated as far as he could, it would have been manslaughter in the servant. The law is the same in the case of the master killing a man in defence of the servant (e).

Where F. C. and O. were in a field fighting upon a quarrel, and M. C. casually riding by, and seeing them in fight, and his kinsmen one of them, rode in, drew his sword, thrust O. through and killed him; Coke, C.J., and the rest of the Court agreed that this was clearly but manslaughter in him, and murder in the other ; for the one may have malice and the other not ; he may come in by chance, and so kill the other (f).

If two persons are fighting, and another interferes with intent to part them, but does not signify such intent, and is killed by one of the combatants, this is but manslaughter (g). And if a third person takes up the cause of one who has been worsted in mutual combat, and attacks the conqueror, and is killed by him, the killing would, it seems, be manslaughter. A. and B. were walking together in Fleet-street, and B. gave some provoking language to A., who, thereupon, gave B. a box on the ear, upon which they closed, and B. was thrown down, and his arm broken. Presently B. ran to his brother's house, which was hard by ; and C., his brother, taking the alarm, came out with his sword drawn, and made towards A., who retreated ten or twelve yards ; and C. pursuing him, A. drew his sword, made a pass at C., and killed him. On an indictment of A. for murder the jury were directed to find it manslaughter, because it was upon a sudden falling out, not se defendendo, partly because A. made the first breach of the peace by striking B. ; and partly because, unless he had fled as far as might be, it could not be said to be in his own defence ; and it appeared plainly upon the evidence, that he might have retreated out of danger, and that his stepping back was rather to have an opportunity to draw his sword, and with more advantage to come upon C., than to avoid him ; and accordingly, at last, it was found manslaughter (h).

Upon an indictment for wounding (under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31) (rep.), it appeared that the prisoner and the prosecutor's brother were fighting, and the prosecutor laid hold of the prisoner in order to prevent him from beating his brother, and held him down on a locker, but did not strike him, and the prisoner then stabbed him. Park, J., directed the jury, that if they were of opinion that the prosecutor did nothing more than was necessary to prevent the prisoner from beating his brother, the crime, if death had ensued, would have been murder ; but if they thought that the prosecutor did more than was necessary to prevent the prisoner from beating the brother, or that he struck any blows, then it would have been manslaughter (i).

A party of men were playing at bowls, when two of them fell out and quarrelled ; and a third man who had not any quarrel, in revenge of his friend, struck the other with a bowl, of which blow he died. This was held manslaughter, because it happened upon a sudden motion in revenge of his friend (j). The two men who fell out were actually fighting together at the time ; for if words only had passed between them, it would have been murder ; nothing but an open affray of striving being such a provocation to one person to meddle with an injury done to another as will lessen the offence to manslaughter, if a man is killed by the person so meddling (k).

between the interference of servants and friends, and that of a mere stranger, yet the limits of such distinction do not appear to be anywhere actually defined. And the nearer or more remote connection of the parties with each other seems to be more a matter of observation to the jury as to the probable force of the provocation, and the motive which induced the interference, than as furnishing any precise rule of law (l).

As a blow aimed with malice at A., and by mistake or accident falling upon B. and killing him, is murder (m); so if a blow aimed at A. and lighting on B. was given in such a transport of sudden passion as, in case A. had died by it, would have reduced the offence to manslaughter, this extenuation applies equally if the blow should happen to kill B. (n).

A widow finding that one of her sons had not prepared her dinner as she had directed him to do, began to scold him, upon which he made her some very impertinent answers, which put her in a passion, and she took up a small piece of iron used as a poker, intending to frighten him, and seeing she was very angry he ran towards the door of the room, when she threw the poker at him, and it happened that the deceased was just coming in at the moment, and the iron struck him on the head, and caused his death. Park, J., told the jury, 'No doubt this poor woman had no more intention of injuring this particular child than I have, but that makes no difference in law. If a blow is aimed at an individual unlawfully—and this was undoubtedly unlawful, as an improper mode of correction—and strikes another and kills him, it is manslaughter, and there is no doubt, if the child at whom the blow was aimed had been struck, and died, it would have been manslaughter, and so it is under the present circumstances' (o).

A quarrel arose between some soldiers and a number of keelmen; and a violent affray ensuing, one of the soldiers was stripped, and cruelly beaten. The prisoner, who was a soldier, had before driven part of the mob down the street with his sword in the scabbard; and on his return, seeing his comrade thus used, drew his sword, and bid the mob stand clear, saying, he would sweep the street; and, on their pressing on him, he struck at them with the flat side of the sword several times; upon which they fled, and he pursued them. The soldier who was stripped got up, and ran into a passage to save himself. The prisoner returned, and asked if they had murdered his comrade; and the people came back, and assaulted him several times, and then ran from him. He sometimes brandished his sword; and then struck fire with the blade of it upon the stones of the street, calling out to the people to keep off. At this time the deceased, who had a blue jacket on, and might be mistaken for a keelman, was going along about five yards from the soldier; but, before he passed, the soldier went to him and struck him on the head with his sword, of which blow he almost immediately expired. It was the opinion of two witnesses that, if the soldier had not drawn his sword, they would both of them have been murdered. The offence was ruled to be manslaughter (p).

SECT. VIII.—OF RESISTANCE TO OFFICERS OF JUSTICE, TO PERSONS ACTING IN THEIR AID, AND TO PRIVATE PERSONS LAWFULLY INTERFERING TO APPREHEND FELONS, OR TO PREVENT A BREACH OF THE PEACE.

‘When a constable, or other person properly authorised, acts in the execution of his duty (q), the law casts a peculiar protection round him, and consequently, if he is killed in the execution of his duty, it is in general murder, even though there be circumstances of hot blood and want of premeditation as would in an ordinary case reduce the crime to manslaughter’ (r). In the earlier authorities such killing is described as of malice aforethought, as being an outrage wilfully committed in defiance of the justice of the kingdom (s).

The protection extends to justices when acting as conservators of the peace, to sheriffs and their bailiffs, and to constables and other peace officers (t), and prison officers (u), whether they are acting under the authority of the common law or of a statute. The officer is under this protection not only at the scene of action but eundo, morando, et redeundo; and if he comes to do his office, and meeting with great opposition, retires and is killed in the retreat, this will amount to murder; as he went in obedience to the law and in the execution of his office, and his retreat was necessary in order to avoid the danger by which he was threatened. Upon the same principle, if he meets with opposition by the way, and is killed before he comes to the place, such killing is murder (s).

The most important of the earlier cases on the subject is the Sissinghurst House case (v). A great number of persons assembled in a house called Sissinghurst, in Kent, issued out and committed a great riot and battery upon the possessors of a wood adjacent. The name of one, A., was known, the rest were not known; and a warrant was obtained from a justice of peace to apprehend A., and divers others persons unknown, who were all together in Sissinghurst House. The constable, with about sixteen or twenty called to his assistance, came with the warrant to the house, and demanded entrance, and told some of the persons within that he was the constable, and came with the justice’s warrant, and demanded A. with the rest of the offenders that were then in the house. One of the persons within came, and read the warrant, but refused admission to the constable, or to deliver A. or any of the malefactors; but, going in,

(q) On indictments for assaulting or killing them, proof that they were so acting is enough without producing their appointment. Butler v. Ford, 1 Cr. & M. 622, 662. McGahey v. Alston, 2 M. & W. 206.

(r) R. v. Allen, per Blackburn, and Mellor, JJ. 17 L. T. (N. S.) 222; Stephen Dig. Cr. Law (6th ed.) 421. The rule is thus stated in a recent Canadian case, in which a constable had been killed in an attempt by prisoners under trial for felony to escape while being conveyed back to prison. ‘Homicide is murder whether the offender means or does not mean that death should ensue, or knew or did not know that it was likely to ensue, if the slayer meant to inflict grievous bodily injury for the purpose of facilitating escape or rescue from prison or lawful custody or lawful arrest.’ R. v. Rice, 4 Ontario L. R. 233.

commanded the rest of the company to stand to their staves. The constable and his assistants, fearing mischief, went away; and being about five rods from the door, B., C., D., E., F., &c., about fourteen in number, issued out and pursued the constable and his assistants. The constable commanded the peace, yet they fell on, and killed one of the assistants of the constable, and wounded others, and then retired into the house to the rest of their company which were in the house, whereof the said A. and one G., that read the warrant, were two. For this A., B., C., D., E., F., G., and others, were indicted of murder, and tried at the King's Bench bar, when these points were unanimously determined:—

1. That although the indictment were, that B. gave the stroke, and the rest were present aiding and assisting, though in truth C. gave the stroke, or that it did not appear upon the evidence which of them gave the stroke, but only that it was given by one of the rioters, yet that such evidence was sufficient to maintain the indictment; for in law it was the stroke of all that party, according to the resolution in Mackalley's case (w).

2. That in this case all who were present and assisting to the rioters were guilty of the death of the party slain, though they did not all actually strike him, or any of the constable's company.

3. That those within the house, if they abetted or counselled the riot, were in law present aiding and assisting, and were principals as well as those who issued out and actually committed the assault; for it was but within five rods of the house, and in view thereof, and all done as it were in the same instant (x).

4. That there was sufficient notice that it was the constable, before the man was killed. (1) Because he was the constable of the same vill. (2) Because he notified his business at the door before the assault, viz., that he came with the justice's warrant. (3) Because, after his retreat, and before the man was slain, the constable commanded the peace; and, nevertheless, the rioters fell on and killed the man.

5. That the killing of the assistant of the constable was as much murder as would have been killing the constable himself.

6. That those who come in to the assistance of the constable, though not specially called thereunto, are under the same protection as they that are called to his assistance by name.

7. That although the constable retired with his company upon the not delivering up of A., yet the killing of the assistant of the constable in that retreat was murder. (1) Because the retreat was one continued act in pursuance of his office; being necessary, when he could not attain the object of his warrant, and being in effect a continuation of the execution of his office, and under the same protection of the law as his coming was. (2) Principally because the constable, in the beginning of the assault, and before the man was stricken, commanded the peace.

It seems that even if the constable had not commanded the peace, yet as he and his company came about what the law allowed them, and, when they could not effect it fairly, were going their way, the rioters pursuing them and killing one made the offence murder in them all; for the act was done without provocation, and the constable and his company were peaceably retiring; but this point was not relied upon, because there was enough upon the former points to convict the offenders.

In the conclusion, the jury found nine guilty, and acquitted those within, not because they were absent, but because there was no clear evidence that they consented to the assault as the jury thought; and therefore judgment of death was given against the nine.

In time past peace officers have occasionally taken opposite sides in an affray and the death of one has ensued. Where the officers act as partisans they lose their protection as officers (y), and where constables interfere with the sheriff or his officers in the execution of writs and slay a sheriff's officer the killing would be murder, as they are not entitled to obstruct the sheriff in the execution of the King's writ (z).

Authority of the Officers.

Justices of the Peace.—The powers and duties of justices of the peace as conservators of the peace are not now exercised by personal interposition or making arrests in dealing with breaches of the peace, except in the case of riot, as to which vide ante, Book VI. Chapter I. p. 431, but by the judicial act of issuing warrants or other process for the arrest of offenders.

Sheriffs and Bailiffs.—The sheriff has powers and duties as to pursuit and arrest of felons (a), and as to suppression of riots (b). But in modern practice the functions of the sheriff and his bailiffs are restricted to the execution of writs, &c., issued by the High Court of Justice (c). If he is resisted in the execution of a writ he is to take with him the posse comitatus and go himself to do execution, and may arrest the resisters, whose resistance is a misdemeanor (d). The powers and duties of bailiffs and officers of County Courts (e), and other inferior civil Courts of Record are analogous to those of the sheriff and his officers. And all are within the same special protection as constables.

In civil cases the authority of the sheriff, and his bailiffs, &c., to arrest or imprison is regulated and limited by the writ or process which he is empowered to execute and the extent of the district in which he is privileged to act (e). He is protected if the process, though erroneous, is not void (f), but not if it is void on the face of it.

Constables and Police Officers.—The common-law constables, head-boroughs and bors-holders are now rarely, if ever, appointed, but the following statutory peace officers are by the statutes under which they are appointed given the powers, privileges, and immunities, and made liable for the duties of a constable within his constablewick.

1. A special constable duly appointed by justices within the area for which those justices have jurisdiction until his services are suspended or determined (g).

2. Local constables appointed for parishes within the county for which they are appointed and the adjoining county (h).

3. Officers of the statutory county police, throughout the county (i), and in every borough situate wholly or in part within the county (j).

4. Officers of the statutory police of a municipal borough (which has a separate police force) within the borough or within seven miles of it (k).

5. Constables appointed under the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, within the limits of the special Act relating to the town and in any place not more than five miles beyond such limits (l).

6. Officers of the Metropolitan Police Force (m), and the City of London Police Force (n).

7. Prison officers in convict or local prisons (o).

8. Constables appointed for canals (p).

Constables, and other peace officers, are invested with large powers and duties at common law, for the purpose of preserving the peace, preventing the commission of criminal offences, apprehending offenders, and executing the warrants of justices of the peace. Every constable, within the limits of his district, is a conservator of the peace at common law (pp). It is his duty, therefore, to do all that he can to preserve the peace within his constablewick (q). And in order the better to enable peace officers to preserve the peace, they have authority to command all other persons to assist them, in endeavouring to appease such disturbances as take place in their presence (r).

Arrest without Warrant.—The powers of a constable or like peace officer to make arrests without warrant depend (1) on the common law, (2) on numerous statutes.

(1) COMMON LAW.—At common law a constable may arrest a person whom he finds committing a felony, or may arrest upon reasonable suspicion that a felony has been committed by the person arrested, although no felony has, in fact, been committed (s), and whether the reasonable grounds of suspicion are matters within the constable's knowledge, or are derived from facts stated to him by others (t).

A constable is not as a general rule entitled to arrest for misdemeanor after it has been committed, whether the offence be fraud, breach of the peace, &c. ; nor to arrest on suspicion of misdemeanor (u).

He may arrest any person who in his presence commits a misdemeanor or breach of the peace (v), if the arrest is effected at the time when, or immediately after, the offence is committed (w), or while there is danger of its renewal (x), but not after the breach, or danger of its renewal, has ceased (y). He may arrest or start in immediate pursuit if the misdemeanor is a breach of the public peace (z). And he may take into his custody persons given in charge to him by persons who have witnessed a breach of the peace, if there is danger of its immediate renewal (a), but not if the affray is over and peace restored (b).

The common law power of arrest extends to persons who threaten to kill, beat, or hurt another, or to break the peace in his presence, if complaint is at once made to the constable by the person threatened (c).

There are statements in the early authorities as to the right of peace officers to arrest persons reasonably suspected of being night walkers (d), or disorderly persons, and persons unduly armed (e), which appear to have been made with reference to a statute now repealed (f), and the arrest of idle and disorderly persons and suspected persons and reputed thieves, frequenting or lying or loitering in public places, is now regulated by statute (g).

Where a policeman saw the prisoner playing the bagpipes in a street at half-past eleven o'clock at night, by which he collected a large crowd around him, among whom were prostitutes and thieves, and the policeman told him he could not be allowed to play at that time of night, and he must go on, but he said he would be damned if he would, and the policeman took hold of him by the shoulder, and slightly pushed him, on which the prisoner wounded him with a razor; it was held, that if the prisoner was collecting a crowd of persons at that time of night, and the policeman desired him to go on, and laid his hand upon his shoulder with that view only, he did not exceed his duty, and if the prisoner then wounded him, it would have been murder if he had died; but if the policeman gave the prisoner a blow and knocked him down, he was not justified in so doing (h).

Riot.—The general and special powers and duties of justices, sheriffs, under-sheriffs, constables, and other peace officers, as to the suppression of riots are stated ante, Book VI. Chapter I. sect. 6, p. 431 (i).

(2) STATUTE.—Power to arrest without warrant is given by many statutes as to many misdemeanors and petty offences, e.g., persons found lying or loitering in a highway, yard, or place during the night, whom the constable reasonably suspects of having committed or being about to commit any felony against the Larceny, Malicious Damage, or Offences against the Person Acts of 1861 (j).

The powers of a peace officer to arrest upon the warrant of a judicial officer depend on the competence of the judicial officer to issue the warrant, the person or persons to whom it is addressed, the district in which the execution of the warrant is attempted, and the mode adopted for executing it.

Persons acting in Aid of Officers of Justice.—The protection which the law affords to ministers of justice extends also to every person coming to their aid and lending his assistance for the keeping of the peace, &c., or attending for that purpose, whether commanded or not, provided that the slayer has knowledge or notice that they are so acting in assistance (k).

In R. v. Phelps (l), the deceased having been required by a policeman to aid him in taking a man, whom he had apprehended on suspicion of stealing potatoes, to the station-house, did so for some time, and then was going away, when he was attacked and beaten to death. arrest, even although he did not intend to inflict grievous injury, he is equally guilty of murder. But if in the course of the struggle he kicked the man, not intending to kick him, then he is only guilty of manslaughter.’

In case of a riot, if a constable sees a breach of the peace committed, he may call upon any one present for his assistance if there is a reasonable necessity therefor. If the person called upon, without any physical impossibility or law excuse refuse to do so, he is liable to be indicted, and it is no defence that in consequence of the number of rioters the single aid of the person called upon would have been of no use. R. v. Brown, C. & M. 314. Vide ante, Book VI. Chapter I. sect. 6, p. 431.

Private Persons.—The protection extends also under certain limitations to private persons who interpose to keep the peace and suppress an affray by parting or arresting the combatants, whether the combat arises from a sudden or premeditated quarrel (o), or endeavour to arrest and bring to justice felons or persons who have given a dangerous wound. As they are discharging duties or exercising powers imposed and given by law, they are in a sense engaged in the public service and for the advancement of justice, though not specially appointed (p). If such a person is resisted and killed, the slayer is guilty of murder if he had express notice of the purpose for which the deceased came, e.g., by his commanding the peace or otherwise shewing that his interposition was in the interests of peace and justice, or with friendly intent (q). Where express notice is not given the purpose of the private intervention may be misunderstood and the violence offered may be extenuated (r).

At common law a private person may, on his own initiative, without warrant, apprehend and detain, until they can be carried before a magistrate, all persons found committing or attempting to commit a felony (s); and where a felony has actually been committed may arrest any person reasonably suspected of having committed it (t). He is also justified in using force to prevent the commission of felony (u), and in arresting persons committing a breach of the public peace, or in giving them into the custody of a peace officer at the time of the breach or while there is danger of its renewal (v).

Foster says (Crown Law, p. 318): ‘In the case of private persons using their endeavours to bring felons to justice, these cautions ought to be observed: That a felony hath been actually committed (w). For if no felony hath been committed, no suspicion, how well soever grounded, will bring the person so interposing within the protection of the law in the sense I have already stated and explained.’

Sect. 16. 'Supposing a felony to have been actually committed, but not by the person arrested or pursued upon suspicion, this suspicion, though probably well founded, will not bring the person endeavouring to arrest or imprison within the protection of the law, so far as to excuse him from the guilt of manslaughter, if he killeth, or on the other hand to make the killing of him amount to murder. I think it would be felonious homicide, but not murder, in either case; the one not having used due diligence to be apprised of the truth of the fact; the other not having submitted and rendered himself to justice, since, if his case would bear it, he might have resorted to his ordinary remedy for the false imprisonment.'

Hale says (1 H. P. C. 490): 'If A. be suspected by B. to commit a felony, but in truth he committed none, neither is indicted, yet upon the offer to arrest him by B. he resists or flies, whereby B. cannot take him without killing him, and B. kills him, if in truth there were no felony committed, or B. had not a probable cause to suspect him, this killing is at least manslaughter, but if there were a felony committed, and B. hath cause to suspect A., but in truth A. is not guilty of the fact, though upon this account B. may justify the imprisonment of A., yet quære, if B. kills A. in the pursuit, whether this will excuse him from manslaughter' (x).

He says further (2 H. P. C. 82): 'But if a felony be committed, and A. upon probable cause suspects B. to have been the felon, though the law permits him to arrest B., though in truth innocent, yet he cannot justify the killing of him upon his flight and refusing to submit, justiciari se permittere nolens; but if he kills him, it is at his peril; for if B. be innocent it is at least manslaughter (3 Co. Inst. 56, 221; 22 Assiz. 55), and the reason is because B. is not bound to take notice of A. as authorised to arrest him, as being no officer, nor having any warrant. It is true, a constable arresting in the king's name, or offering so to do, the party is bound to take notice and submit, as hath been said (part 1, cap. 37), but a mere stranger offering to do it, a man is not bound to take notice of his authority, and therefore may fly from him if innocent, for possibly he may think he came to rob him. Yet farther, if an innocent person be actually arrested upon suspicion by a private person, all circumstances being duly observed, and he breaks away from the arrest, yet I do not think the person arresting can kill him, though he cannot be otherwise taken, for the person arrested is not bound to take notice of that authority that the law gives to a private person in this case.'

Upon an indictment for unlawful wounding, it appeared that the prisoner had asked and obtained permission to take a basket of ashes from the prosecutor's ash-pit. As he was carrying away the ashes the prosecutor's apprentice saw among the ashes the spout of a new tea-kettle which had stood on a shelf near the ash-pit, and gave the alarm. The prosecutor then seized the prisoner to detain him while a constable was sent for. The prisoner resisted, and in the struggle both fell, and the prisoner cut the prosecutor with a knife; a rattle of copper had been heard while the prisoner was at the ash-pit. It was objected that the prosecutor had no right to detain the prisoner. Alderson, B., said: 'That will depend on whether the jury are satisfied that the prisoner had in fact stolen the tea-kettle. If he had stolen the tea-kettle, the prosecutor had a right to detain him, and this wounding will be felony' (y).

Hue and Cry.—If a felony is committed, and the felon flies from justice, or a dangerous wound is given, it is the duty of every man to use his best endeavours to prevent an escape; and in such cases, if fresh suit be made, and a fortiori, if hue and cry is raised (z), all who join in aid of those who began the pursuit, are under the same protection of the law (a). Thus, where upon a robbery committed by several, the person robbed raised hue and cry, and the country pursued the robbers, and one of the pursuers was killed by one of the robbers, it was held that this was murder, because the country, upon hue and cry raised, are authorised by law to pursue and apprehend the malefactors; and that, although there was no warrant of a justice of the peace to raise hue and cry, nor any constable in the pursuit, yet the hue and cry was a good warrant in law for the pursuers to apprehend the felons; and that, therefore, the killing of any of the pursuers was murder (b).

The question is raised by the earlier writers whether a private person is bound to arrest a person indicted for felony if no warrant is produced, and whether, if a private person kills a person accused of felony in endeavouring to arrest him, the slayer's justification depends on the guilt or innocence of the person arrested. Knowledge that an indictment had been found or a warrant issued might create a reasonable suspicion of guilt, but would not justify the slaying; and the arrest by a private person without warrant is a trespass if no felony had in fact been committed (c).

Statutes.—The following statutes authorise arrest without warrant by private persons, as well as by peace officers (d):—

Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 103: Of any person 'found committing' any offence against the Act whether punishable on indictment or summary conviction (e), except angling in the day time (f).

Coinage Offences Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 99), s. 31: Of any person found committing any indictable offence against the Act.

Prevention of Offences Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 19), s. 11: Of any person found committing any indictable offence in the night, i.e. between 9 p.m. and 6 a.m.

Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. c. 83), s. 6: Of any person found offending against the Act.

Persons 'found committing' any offence against the Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), may be arrested without warrant by a peace officer or the owner of the property injured or his servant, or any person authorised by him (sect. 61) (ff).

In the event of arrest of an offender by a person other than a peace officer it is his duty at common law or under the particular statute to convey or deliver his prisoner to a peace officer (g), in order that he may be conveyed as soon as reasonably may be before a justice of peace, &c., to be dealt with according to law, or to take him with all convenient speed before a justice.

Statutes authorising arrest without warrant have been construed somewhat strictly. The arrest will be illegal if not in close accordance with the words of the statute, e.g. if it is not immediate or if on arrest the prisoner is detained in private custody (h), instead of being handed over to officers of the law. The words 'found committing' used in many of these statutes are not limited to 'caught in the act.'

In Hanway v. Boulton (i), the plaintiff, a pedlar, went to the house of Mr. B., and a small dog of Mr. B.'s ran out at the plaintiff, who with a stick gave the dog a blow, which stunned and permanently blinded it. The plaintiff then went away, and Mrs. B. immediately sent a boy to fetch a constable. The boy returned with the constable, and Mrs. B. directed them to go after the plaintiff and apprehend him for the injury done to the dog. They went in pursuit of the plaintiff, and found him at a public-house about a mile from Mr. B.'s, and the constable apprehended him and took him before the magistrate. Tindal, C.J. (in summing up), said: 'The jury will have to consider first, whether the plaintiff had committed a wilful injury to the dog; and secondly, whether he was found committing that offence and immediately apprehended. With respect to the second question, the words of 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 30 certainly differ materially from those in 1 Geo. IV. c. 56 (j), and were obviously meant to restrict the powers

Curran*, 3 C. & P. 397, where a man found in a field adjoining one from which turnips had been stolen, was apprehended by a servant of the owner of the turnips, under the owner's directions, and taken to the owner's house, and then to the constable, instead of being taken forthwith before a justice as directed by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, s. 63 (rep.). In R. v. Phelps (C. & M. 180), an indictment for murder of a person acting in aid of a constable, the constable had arrested a man at night, and had found potatoes concealed on his person, which appeared to have been recently dug: but he had not seen him steal, dig up the potatoes, nor was there any evidence that any gardens had been robbed, or that the prisoner had been near any garden. It was held that the arrest of the prisoner was not authorised by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, s. 63 (rep.), nor at common law, as stealing potatoes out of a garden is not an offence at common law. Cf. Ballinger v. Ferris, 1 M. & W. 628. Reed v. Cowmeadow, 6 A. & E. 661, and Beachey v. Sides, 9 B. & C. 806, cases of illegal arrest under 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 30, s. 28, now incorporated in 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 61.

(i) 1 M. & Rob. 15; 4 C. & P. 350.

(j) The words of 1 Geo. IV. c. 56, s. 3 (repealed by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27), were: 'Any person or persons who shall have actually committed, or be in the act of committing,' any offence. The words of 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 30, s. 28 (rep.), on which this case turned, were the same as those in 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, s. 63, repealed, given by that Act. The object of the legislature seems to have been to allow the immediate apprehension of a party taken in the commission of a crime of this nature, because otherwise such offences would frequently be committed by persons passing through or having no fixed domicile in the place, and they would therefore entirely escape, if the party injured were obliged to wait for the formalities of a charge before a magistrate, or a warrant. Where the offender is fixed in the country, so that he can be found and apprehended at a subsequent time, there is no reason why that apprehension should not be after a regular proceeding; and the statute therefore differs from 1 Geo. IV. c. 56, and does not allow a stale apprehension on an old charge, without a warrant. Still the words of the present statute must not be taken so strictly as to defeat its reasonable operation. Suppose a party seen in the act of committing the crime were to run away, and immediate and fresh pursuit to be made: I think that would be sufficient. So, in this case, the party is actually seen in the commission of the act complained of: as soon as possible an officer is sent for, and he is taken as soon as possible. No greater diligence could be required; and that being the case, I think it must be treated as an "immediate apprehension" for an offence which the plaintiff, supposing under the circumstances that it was an offence at all, was "found committing," and this was the imprisonment complained of.

But arrest at 10 p.m. of a person who committed an offence at 1 a.m. has been held not to be within sect. 103 of the Larceny Act, 1861, on the ground that the word 'immediately' in that section means immediately after the commission of the offence, not immediately after the discovery that it has been committed (k).

In R. v. Fraser (l), where a policeman found the prisoner in a garden at night, stooping down close to the ground, and the prisoner ran away, and the policeman ran after him and caught him; and it appeared that the prisoner was plucking some carnations in the garden, and the jury found that the prisoner had wilfully and maliciously plucked flowers from plants in the garden with intent to steal them, and that he was found by the policeman committing that offence, but that the policeman did not inform the prisoner by word of mouth that he belonged to the police force. On a case reserved, it was held that the policeman had authority to apprehend the prisoner.

In actions for illegal arrest in intended exercise of the powers given by sect. 103 of the Larceny Act, 1861, it has been held that the defendant was entitled to notice of action if he acted in bona fide belief, in circumstances which, if they had really existed, would have amounted to a justification (m). It would seem that the arrest would be justified if the person arrested was seen in a position justifying the belief that he had committed the offence and the prisoner is arrested then and there or after fresh pursuit (n).

it appeared that near midnight two men were seen near a board-house belonging to O. ; on two persons going up to the board-house, they heard a noise, and they found the door half open, and saw the prisoner inside and heard a noise among the boards, and the prisoner said ‘ Bring the board ’ ; the two persons then went to O.’s house to call him up ; one of them then went to the bottom of the road, which was about one hundred yards from the board-house, and in a quarter of an hour O. came up, with a carving knife in his hand, and having also got another person to assist him, they went to the board-house, the door of which was then closed ; the hasp was over the staple, and the padlock was in the staple, but not locked ; nobody was in the board-house, they went in, and O. found two planks removed from the place, where he had seen them four days before, to another part of the board-house, nearer the door ; they then went on from the board-house, and after searching in several places found the prisoner in the garden of another person, crouched down with a drawn sword in his hand ; the prisoner was asked twice what he did there, he made no answer, and then he started off ; one of the witnesses ran and caught hold of him, but the prisoner compelled him to leave hold of him ; the prisoner fell over something, and then the other witnesses came up ; the prisoner struck O. on the side with his sword, but did not cut him ; then the prisoner again attempted to get away, but was prevented by some pailing ; the prisoner then turned round and struck O. with his sword, cut through O.’s hat into his head, and produced a slight wound on his head ; up to that time O. had not struck the prisoner any blow ; the jury negatived the felony in removing the boards from one part of the board-house to another ; and it was objected that the prosecutor had no right to apprehend either at common law or under the Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. c. 83), s. 6 ; for at common law the power to arrest for offences inferior to felony was confined to the time of committing the offence, and it was the same under the Vagrancy Act ; that the prisoner was not found by the prosecutor committing the offence, but, on the contrary, had ceased from the attempt and abandoned the intention, which distinguished this case from R. v. Hunt (p). On a case reserved, it was held that the prisoner might lawfully be apprehended, for as he was seen in the board-house, and was taken on fresh pursuit before he had left the neighbourhood, it was the same as if he had been taken in the outhouse, or in running away from it (q).

In R. v. Gardiner (r), upon an indictment for maliciously wounding, it appeared that the prisoner, with several other persons, was found by J., a constable, playing at thimblerieg and betting with the people at a fair (s), in the afternoon. J. having received verbal instructions from the magistrates to apprehend such offenders, tried, with the assistance of another person, to apprehend the prisoner and his companions, and succeeded in taking one, but the prisoner and two others of the company fell upon J., rescuing their companion, and got away themselves. About nine o'clock in the evening, J., not having been able to find the prisoner before, saw him with several of his companions in a public-house, and said to him, 'You are my prisoner.' The prisoner asked 'For what?' and J. replied, for what he had been doing in the fair; the prisoner resisted, and a scuffle ensued; the prisoner escaped and concealed himself in a privy in the garden. J. called another constable to his assistance, and they together broke open the privy door and endeavoured to take the prisoner, upon which he took a knife out of his pocket and stabbed the other constable. The jury found that the prisoner knew that the constable was endeavouring to take him for the offence committed at the fair; but upon a case reserved, the judges held that the attempt to apprehend was not lawful under the Vagrancy Act, as it was not made on fresh pursuit (t).

Poaching Cases.—There have been several decisions arising out of the exercise or attempted exercise of the powers given by the Night Poaching Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 69), to arrest poachers when three or more are found in the night committing an offence under that Act (u). The powers may be exercised by the owner or occupier of the land on which the poachers are found committing the offence (v), or persons having rights of free warren or free chase thereon or the lord of the manor wherein the land lies, and by the gamekeepers (w), or servants of such persons or any person, assisting them (sect. 2), and if the offence is indictable, e.g., under sect. 9, as to three or more persons armed poaching by night (x), by any person whether a constable or not (14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 11). (v) R. v. Warner, 1 Mood. 380. In this case the prosecutor, being out on duty at night as gamekeeper with his assistant on his master's manor, heard shots towards a wood not belonging to his master, and shortly afterwards saw the prisoners coming along a road in the direction from the wood; the prisoners were armed with a gun, gun-barrel, and bludgeons; they stopped when they saw the prosecutor and his assistant; the prosecutor and his assistant advanced towards the prisoners, when the prosecutor said: 'So, you have been knocking them down; you are a pretty set of people to be out so late at night'; they were then about three yards off; the prosecutor said to his assistant, sufficiently loud for the prisoners to hear, 'Mind him with the gun'; the assistant took hold of the gun gently, one hand on the stock the other on the barrel, and took off the cap gently; there was no struggle; the man did not seem angry at the assistant's holding the gun; the prosecutor saw one of the prisoners, and advanced to look at the faces of the other two, but they bounced off. The prosecutor then turned back towards his assistant and the man who had the gun, and called out as loud as he could: 'Forward, G.' G. was the keeper of the manor in which the wood was situate, but he was not there. Three of the men ran in upon the prosecutor, knocked him down and stunned him; when he recovered himself he saw all the men coming by him, and one said, 'Damn 'em, we have done 'em both'; they had got two or three paces beyond him, and one of them turned back and struck the prosecutor a violent blow on the left leg with what he thought was a stick, which wounded him in the leg; the prosecutor had committed no assault on either of the four men. The assistant took hold of the gun to prevent the man's running away, but did not tell him so; he took hold of it to let the keeper see if he knew the men; the manor, in which the wood was, extended more than 200 yards beyond where the prisoners were seen. It was objected that the prisoners were on the high road, and the prosecutor and his assistant had no right to obstruct them. Bolland, B., overruled the objection, and directed the jury that if the prisoners acted in concert, all were equally guilty. They were found guilty, and upon a case reserved, the conviction was upheld. Cf. R. v. Edmeads, 3 C. & P. 390.

(w) This includes a person appointed, even without written authority, to watch for night poachers. R. v. Price, 7 C. & P. 178.

arrest under the Act of 1828 extends in case of pursuit to any other place to which the offender escapes (y), or on the road on which he is found (z). Persons seeking to arrest in lawful exercise of these powers are within the special protection of the law, and if a gamekeeper is killed in a lawful attempt to apprehend, the offender will be guilty of murder, though the keeper had previously struck the offender or one of his party, if he struck in self-defence only, and to diminish the violence illegally used against him, and not vindictively to punish (a).

But if a keeper is killed in an attempt to arrest a poacher without lawful authority, the offence is only manslaughter (b), and the same would be the case if the keeper was servant of the owner of the game, but not of the owner of the land, &c. (c).

Notice of the Authority and Business of the Officer.—To make the killing of an officer of the law or person acting in aid or execution of the law murder under the circumstances dealt with in this section, the person whose liberty is interfered with and those who interfere to resist such officer or person must have actual knowledge or express or implied notice (d) of the officer's status and business (e). Where a bailiff pushed abruptly and violently into a gentleman's chamber early in the morning to arrest him without announcing his business or using words of arrest, and the gentleman in the first surprise snatched down a sword and killed the bailiff, not knowing him to be an officer of the law, the killing was ruled manslaughter (f). But where a man said to a bailiff, who came to arrest him: 'Stand off, I know you well enough, come on at your peril,' and on the bailiff taking hold of him, ran the bailiff through and killed him, it was held murder (g). Where, of a number of persons concerned in killing an officer in the execution of his duty, some have notice of his status and others have not, the former may be guilty of murder and the latter of manslaughter (h), unless they deliberately engaged in the fray meaning to make common cause and maintain it by force (i).

In some cases the circumstances of the case render notice unnecessary, e.g., where an attempt is made to arrest a man while committing an offence or on fresh pursuit (j).

(y) R. v. Price, ubi supra, where the prisoner who on pursuit had escaped from a wood within a manor (not in the ownership or occupation of the lord of the manor), but being hard pressed, fled back into the manor and there attempted to fire a loaded gun at his pursuers.

The same principle applies where persons other than officers of the law are seeking to make an arrest which by common law or statute they are empowered to make.

Thus where upon an indictment for malicious wounding, it appeared that the assistant to the head keeper of Sir R. S. went with five or six assistants towards a covert of Sir R. S., where they heard guns; they then went towards the place, and rushed in at the poachers to take them; the prosecutor saw six persons in the wood, and he ran after them; they got into a field about six yards off; they then ranged themselves in a row, the prosecutor being five or six yards from them, on the edge of the plantation, and he heard one of them say: 'The first man that comes out I'll be d——d if I don't shoot him'; upon which the prosecutor drew his pistol, cocked it, and ran out: they all ran away together; the prosecutor followed them, and when they had all run about fifty yards they stood; they had all turned round; one of them shot at the prosecutor, who was running to him; the prosecutor was wounded; the men said nothing to the prosecutor before he was shot, nor he to them; it was objected, that, inasmuch as the prosecutor's authority to apprehend them was derived from the act creating the offence, it was incumbent upon him to give notice to them: the objection was overruled: and, upon a case reserved, the judges were of opinion that the circumstances constituted sufficient notice (k). So where a servant of Sir T. W. was out with his gamekeeper at night, and they heard two guns fired, and went towards the place, and got into a covert, and saw some men there who ran away, and the servant pursued them, and got close up to one of them, and made a catch at his legs, and was immediately shot in the side; Parke, B., said: 'Where parties find poachers in a wood, they need not give any intimation by words that they are gamekeepers, or that they come to apprehend; the circumstances are sufficient notice. What can a person poaching in a wood suppose when he sees another at his heels?' (l).

Where officers of the law intervene to preserve the peace or make arrests, their functions may be indicated by their uniform or production of their official staves, or any other known ensign of authority (m), e.g. warrant cards, or by their commanding the peace, or declaring their office and saying that they arrest in the King's name (n), or by producing a warrant or writ from a Court or magistrate or in some other way indicating their status and the purpose of their intervention. Where the officer is in his own district and his official capacity is known, or generally acknowledged, or if he is in uniform, the law will readily presume notice of his capacity and the purpose of his intervention (o).

Notification by implication of law is held to have been given where the officers have warrants directed to them as such. Thus, where a warrant had been granted against the prisoner by a justice of peace for an assault, and directed to the constable of Pattishal, and delivered by the person who had obtained it to the deceased, to execute as constable of the parish, and it appeared that the deceased went to the prisoner's house in the daytime to execute the warrant, had his constable's staff with him, and gave notice of his business, and further, that he had before acted as constable of the parish, and was generally known as such : this was held sufficient evidence and notification of the deceased being constable, although there was no proof of his appointment, or of his being sworn into the office (p).

To make it murder to kill a private or special bailiff or officer in resisting arrest the party must know or be notified of the officer's status and his warrant of appointment should be shewn, but need not be parted with as it is his justification (q) and information given as to the legal process which he is seeking to execute (r). In the night-time further notification is necessary, but commanding the peace or using words notifying his business are sufficient, whether the officer is acting in execution of civil or criminal process, &c. (s).

Mode of executing Legal Authority.—Ex hypothesi, the authority which the officer, &c., seeks to exercise must be one given by law, whether it be exerciseable without judicial warrant at common law or by statute, or be given by judicial warrant : and it must be executed in a regular and lawful manner, whether as to the arrest, detention, or treatment of the persons whose liberty is interfered with. If an officer attempts to make an arrest out of a district in which he is authorised to act, or out of the jurisdiction of the Court from which the process issued, or without any legal warrant or justification and a struggle ensues in which he is killed, the killing is manslaughter only (t). Instances of this are where process is executed out of the jurisdiction of the Court which issued it (u), or an arrest is made on a Sunday, or an attempt is made to execute in an exclusive liberty a writ not containing a non omittas clause (v), or in a case where it is not permitted by law (w). Execution of process within the jurisdiction of the issuing Court is sufficient at common law, though it is outside the district of the officer to whom it is directed by name (x), and process may be executed by night as well as by day (y). The execution of justices' warrants by police officers, &c., is now in the main regulated by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, ss. 10, 11, as to indictable offences, and by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 3, as to offences punishable on summary conviction (z). These enactments provide for the execution of warrants out of the county in which they are issued, after backing by a justice of the county in which they are to be executed (a).

Execution of Warrants.—Arrest on a warrant for misdemeanor is not legal unless it is effected by or in the presence of (b) the person named or designated thereon and he has the warrant with him (c) for production if required (d).

Upon an indictment for maliciously wounding, it appeared that a constable having a warrant to apprehend P, gave it to his son, who went in pursuit of P. in company with his brother; the father staying behind. They found P. lying under a hedge, and when they first saw him he had a knife in his hand running the blade of it into the ground. He got up from the ground to run away, and the son laid hold of him, and he stabbed the son with the knife; the father was in sight at about a quarter of a mile off. Parke, B., said: 'The arrest was illegal, as the father was too far off to be assisting in it; and there is no evidence that the prisoner had prepared the knife beforehand to resist illegal violence. If a person receives illegal violence, and he resists that violence with anything he happens have in his hand, and death ensues, that would be manslaughter. If the prisoner had taken out this knife on seeing the young man come up, it might be evidence of previous malice, but that is not so, as we find that the knife was in his hand when the young man first came in sight' (e).

Where a warrant for felony has been issued, an officer who knows of its issue may effect arrest though he has not the warrant (f). Where several persons are named or designated in a warrant any one of them may execute it (g). It has been held that a warrant directed to a constable of G. could not legally be executed by a county police officer (h).

and on an indictment for maliciously wounding A. with intent to resist lawful apprehension, it appeared that the prisoner had been arrested on a warrant on a charge of assault and had been brought before a magistrate and ordered to find bail, which he refused to do. An order was then made for his commitment. While the commitment was being made out the prisoner escaped, and on A. following him by verbal direction from the justices and their clerk, the prisoner cut A. with a knife. Gaselee, J., ruled that the warrant continued in force and a conviction was upheld on a case reserved (k).

Where the warrant is good on the face of it, and for an offence within the jurisdiction of the issuing magistrate, the officer executing it is protected irrespective of the truth or falsity of the charge upon which the warrant was granted (l). Warrants issued by magistrates, &c., acting by special statutory authority and out of the course of the common law ought to shew on the face of them by direct averment or reasonable intendment the authority of the magistrate (m).

Where an officer endeavouring to execute process is resisted and killed, the crime will not amount to murder, unless the process is legal; but by this is to be understood only that the process, whether by writ or warrant, must not be defective in the frame of it, or bad on the face of it, and must issue in the ordinary course of justice from a Court or magistrate having jurisdiction in the case (n). Therefore, though there may have been error or irregularity in the proceeding previous to the issuing of the process, it will be murder if the sheriff or other officer should be killed in the execution of it; for the officer to whom it is directed must at his peril obey it (o).

If a capias ad satisfaciendum, fieri facias, writ of assistance, or any other writ of the like kind is issued, directed to the sheriff, and he or any of his officers are killed in the execution of it, it is sufficient, upon an indictment for this murder, to produce the writ and warrant (p), without producing the judgment or decree (q). Upon an indictment for assaulting E. in the execution of his office of sub-bailiff of a County Court, it appeared that the prisoner was arrested by E. under a warrant issued in the form authorised by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 61 (r) for not having satisfied a judgment and costs. On a case reserved, it was held that the previous proceedings in the County Court need not be proved; for the process of the County Court was as much a justification to the officer by virtue of the Act, as a writ of execution out of a superior Court to a sheriff (s). And on an indictment for assaulting B., a messenger of a district Court of Bankruptcy, it appeared that B., in consequence of information that certain ironstone belonging to J. and O. who were bankrupts was lying in a boat, obtained a warrant from two justices to search for the property of J. and O., and went with this warrant to search the boat, whereupon the assault was committed. Erle, J., held that it was unnecessary to shew the validity of the proceedings prior to the grant of the justices' warrant (t). So, even if the warrant of a justice of peace is not in strictness lawful, e.g., if it does not express the cause with sufficient particularity; yet, if the matter is within his jurisdiction, the killing of the officer executing the warrant will be murder (u). In all cases of process, both civil and criminal, the falsity of the charge contained in such process does not excuse or extenuate killing the officer; for every man is bound to submit himself to the regular course of justice (v). Thus the person executing an escape warrant was held to be under the special protection of the law, though the warrant had been obtained by gross imposition on the magistrate, and by false information as to the matters suggested in it (w).

A sergeant at mace in the City of London having authority, according to the custom of the city, by entry in the porter's book at one of the counters (x), to arrest M. for debt, arrested him between five and six in the evening of November 8, saying at the same time, 'I arrest you in the King's name, at the suit of R.'; but he did not produce his mace. M. resisted, and one of his companions killed the officer. Upon a special verdict it was urged that the arrest in the night was illegal, that the sergeant should have shewn his mace, and that a custom stated in the verdict to arrest without process first against the goods was illegal: but the objections were overruled (y).

A justice for the county of Herts issued his warrant, directing a constable to arrest J. H., charged with stealing a mare. Armed with this warrant the constable went to Smithfield in the City of London, and there arrested R. H., who was the party against whom information had been given, and against whom the magistrate intended to issue his warrant and who was supposed to be called J. H.; his name, however, was really R. H., J. H. being the name of his father. There was no proof that a felony had been committed. The person who made the charge before the justice pointed out R. H. as the man who had stolen the mare, and a person present said that his name was J. H., and there was clearly evidence to go to the jury that R. H. was the man intended to be taken up. Coltman, J., told the jury that the law would not justify the constable's act, the warrant being against J. and not against R., although R. was the party intended to be taken; that a person cannot be lawfully taken under a warrant in which he is described by a name that does not belong to him, unless he has called himself by the wrong name. The direction was held right (z).

Where a constable of the county of Worcester apprehended a man in the city of Worcester under a warrant issued by county justices and not backed by any justice for the city (which has a separate commission), and not after a pursuit out of the county, it was held that the arrest was illegal (a).

A warrant which commanded the constable to apprehend a prisoner, and bring him before a justice 'to answer to all such matters and things as on Her Majesty's behalf shall be objected against him on oath by M. A. W., for an assault committed on her'; was held bad, for it did not state any information on oath that any assault had been committed (b). And where a warrant of a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench directed certain officers to apprehend a person 'and him safely keep, to the end that he may become bound and find sufficient sureties to answer' an indictment for a conspiracy, 'and to be further dealt with according to law'; it was held bad for not directing that the party should be taken before some judge or justice for the purpose of finding sureties (c).

Resisting Arrest or Detention Effected without Warrant.—An arrest unlawfully made without warrant is not made lawful by a warrant taken out afterwards (d).

A prisoner had produced a forged bank note; and his conduct created a suspicion that he knew it to be forged, he was apprehended, and delivered with the note to a constable on a charge that 'he had a forged note in his possession' (e). While thus in custody he shot and wounded the constable. On an indictment under 43 Geo. III., c. 58 (rep.), it was argued that the charge imported no legal offence, and the arrest illegal, and that killing the officer (if that had taken place) would have been only manslaughter. But it was held that in such a charge the same precision was not required as in an indictment; and that the charge must be considered as imputing to the prisoner a guilty possession (f).

On an indictment of B. for wounding with intent to prevent his lawful apprehension, Talfourd, J., held, that to support this charge it was enough

(z) Hoye v. Bush, 1 M. & Gr. 775. He also directed them that his powers as constable to arrest without warrant were limited to the district for which he was chosen. As there was no authority to apprehend Richard H. under the warrant, and the constable was out of his district, he was in the same situation as a private individual. that B. was lawfully apprehended, and that the apprehension was in fact lawful ; and that the question whether or not B. believed it to be lawful, was irrelevant (g).

In R. v. Thompson (h), on an indictment for stabbing with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoner, a journeyman shoemaker, applied to his master for some money, which was refused until he should have finished his work ; and that he applied again subsequently, was again refused, and became abusive, upon which his master threatened to send for a constable. The prisoner then refused to finish his work ; and said that he would go up stairs and pack up his tools, and that no constable should stop him. He went up stairs, came down again with his tools, and drawing from the sleeve of his coat a naked knife, said he would do for the first constable that offered to stop him ; he was ready to die, and would have a life before he lost his own. He then made a flourishing motion with the knife, put it up his sleeve again, and left the shop. The master then applied to the constable to take the prisoner into custody ; making no charge further than saying that he suspected the prisoner had tools of his, and was leaving his work undone. The constable said he would take him if the master would give charge of him ; and they proceeded together to the yard of an inn, where they found the prisoner in a public privy, as if he had occasion there ; the privy had no door to it. The master said, ' That is the man, and I give you charge of him ' ; upon which the constable said to the prisoner, ' My good fellow, your master gives me charge of you, you must go with me.' The prisoner, without saying anything, presented the knife, and stabbed the constable under the left breast, and attempted to make several other blows, which the constable parried with his staff. The prisoner having been found guilty, upon a case reserved, the majority of the judges (i) held, that as an actual arrest would have been illegal, the attempt to make it when the prisoner was in such a situation that he could not get away, and when the waiting to give notice might have enabled the constable to complete the arrest, was such a provocation as, if death had ensued, would have made the case manslaughter only ; and that therefore the conviction was wrong (j).

Upon an indictment for maliciously stabbing with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoners had attempted to push a man into a ditch, upon which a scuffle ensued. The prisoners walked on, and a man complained to H., a watchman, that they had attempted to rob him, desired him to arrest them, followed them till H. came up to them, and then said, sufficiently loud for them to hear, ' That's them.' There was no evidence of any attempt by the prisoners to rob the man, and the only person who saw the transaction negatived it. When H. came up to the prisoners, all he said to them was, ' You must go back and come along with me.' He did not explain why, nor was any charge against the prisoners stated. He was dressed in a watchman's coat, and had his lantern. W., one of the prisoners, said, ' Keep off,' and drew a

A third man put himself in a position as if to strike the watchman, and W. made a spring at him, and caught one of the skirts of his coat; the watchman pulled out his staff, and turned at the prisoners, and they came at him. The watchman struck at W., and hit him on the thick part of the arm with his staff; W. immediately stabbed the watchman, and another of the prisoners followed the watchman, and made another blow at him with another knife. The place where the prisoners attempted to push the man into the ditch was within the limits of the hamlet, for which H. was watchman, but the place where he overtook the prisoners did not appear to be within those limits. The jury found that the prisoners knew H. to be a watchman. On a case reserved nine of the judges held that the watchman could legally arrest the prisoners without saying that he had a charge of robbery against them, though the prisoners had in fact done nothing to warrant the arrest; and that, had death ensued, it would have been murder (k).

Upon an indictment for maliciously cutting W., it appeared that a man travelling upon the highway told the constable that a man coming along the road had been ill-using him, and charged the constable, in the prisoner's hearing, to take the prisoner before a magistrate for so mis-using him; on which the constable ordered the prisoner to stop for insulting a man on the road, laid hold of him, tapped him on the shoulder, said he was his prisoner, and that he should take him to a magistrate, and ordered W. to assist him, which W. did, and to which the prisoner submitted. No particulars of what the supposed ill-usage or insult consisted of appeared in evidence, nor did they pass in the constable's view or hearing, and therefore the apprehension and detainer appeared clearly thus far to have been unlawful. Afterwards, and whilst the prisoner was thus in custody, and before they found a magistrate, the prisoner, in the constable's presence, struck the man who had made the charge against him, and the constable then also told the prisoner he should take him before a magistrate. Some time afterwards, as they were proceeding along to a magistrate's, the prisoner ran away, and attempted to escape, but was pursued by W. by the constable's order; and being overtaken by him, refused to stop, asking W. where his authority was, who said it was in his hand, alluding to a stick, which W. then had in his hand, and which the prisoner had given up to him at the commencement of the detainer; and without further information, when W. was going to take hold of him, the prisoner told him if he would not let him go he would stab him, and then gave him the cut in the face, for which he was indicted. On a case reserved the judges held that the original arrest was illegal, and that the recaption would have been illegal, and therefore the case would not have been murder if death had ensued (l).

Where on an indictment for wounding with intent to disable, it appeared that the prosecutor was a sergeant of police and the prisoner a constable under him, and that the prosecutor went, as it was his duty, to the house of the prisoner to see that he was correct in the discharge of his duty, and the prisoner had some altercation with him, and the prosecutor left the house, the prisoner followed and struck him, and fell when attempting to strike him a second time, and the prosecutor then went away for assistance, and returned to the prisoner's house with two police constables, when the prisoner was not at home: they returned again in two hours and saw him, and the prosecutor told him he must go with him to the station; the prisoner said he would not stir an inch that night; the prosecutor attempted to take hold of him, whereupon the prisoner inflicted a severe wound upon him; and the jury found him guilty of wounding with intent to prevent his apprehension. Upon a case reserved, it was held, that the apprehension was not lawful; for the assault was committed at another time, and there was no probability of its being renewed (m).

Upon an indictment for assaulting a police officer in the execution of his duty, it appeared that the officer was informed that a disturbance was going on at P., and going there found the prisoner's wife sitting crying under a hedge opposite their cottage and went with her into the cottage, and found the prisoner intoxicated, but sufficiently sober to know what he was doing. In his hearing, the wife stated to the officer that the prisoner had knocked her down and beaten her shamefully. One C. was present and stated that (as was the fact) he had seen the prisoner knock his wife down and jump upon her. The prisoner said nothing on hearing these statements. The officer left the cottage, and the prisoner and his wife in it. The prisoner then closed the shutters and locked the door. The officer heard the prisoner using threatening language to his wife, and saw her run out of the cottage. The prisoner said he would lock her out all night, and thereupon she returned to the cottage. The officer heard the prisoner again use very violent language and opened the shutters, and saw the prisoner take up a shovel and hold it in a threatening attitude over his wife's head, and heard him say, 'If it was not for the bloody policeman outside I would split your head open, for 'tis you that sent for the policeman.' The prisoner was near enough to have struck his wife when he raised the shovel. Shortly afterwards he desired her to go to bed, and she replied, 'I can't go up stairs in this state; I don't know one hour from another when I might be murdered.' Prisoner said with an oath, 'I'll leave you altogether,' and went out. This was about twenty minutes after he had raised the shovel. He went on the highway towards his father's house, and when he had walked about seventy yards from his cottage, the officer took him into custody. He had no warrant. C. had been with the officer all the time these things occurred, and insisted upon his taking the prisoner into custody, because he thought it would not be safe to let him go back to his wife that night. The prisoner, on being taken into custody, assaulted the officer. And, upon a case reserved, it was held that the officer was in the execution of his duty when he was assaulted. It is not necessary that a policeman should arrest a man at the very moment he sees an assault committed; it is quite sufficient if he arrests recently after the right to do so arises.

It could not be said that because the prisoner was going away from the house the constable was bound to come to the conclusion that the danger was over. As a conservator of the peace, he had authority to take the prisoner into custody, having so recently witnessed the commission of an assault. Here there was a continuing danger and a continuing pursuit, and it was the duty of the officer to exercise his authority in this case in order to prevent a further breach of the peace, and also that the prisoner might be dealt with according to law in respect to the assault he had so recently committed (n).

Disturbances on Private Premises.—In the execution of their duties as peace officers constables are not confined to disturbances, &c., on highways or in public places. If a person goes into a house or is in it and makes a noise or disturbs the peace of the family, even if no assault or battery has been committed, the master of the house may call in a policeman to turn the disturber out (o): à fortiori if a serious fight or attempt at fighting is going on in the house. The police have power under statute to enter licensed refreshment houses (p) and to enter licensed public-houses to prevent or detect any violation of the Licensing Acts (q), 1872 and 1874, if he has reasonable grounds of suspicion (r). Apart from these statutes, if a police officer hears a disturbance in a public house at night and the door is open he may enter (s), but has no authority to turn anyone out of a public-house unless he has committed an offence punishable by the law (t): nor to prevent a guest from going to a room in the house unless a breach of the peace is likely to occur (u). He may, however, turn out a person who in a public-house makes a noise and disturbance calculated to alarm the neighbourhood (v), and if he will not go quietly away may arrest him (v).

A policeman between eleven and twelve o'clock at night was called upon to clear a beer-house, which he did, and then went into the street where the prisoner and many others were standing near the door. The prisoner refused to go home, and used very abusive and violent language, and the policeman laid his hand on his shoulder gently, and told him to go away, on which the prisoner immediately stabbed him with a knife in the throat. It was held that if the policeman had died, this would have been murder; for if a policeman had heard any noise in the beer-house at such a time of night, he would have acted within the line of his duty if he had gone in and insisted that the house should be cleared; and much more so, if he was required by the landlady ; and after that was done, if a knot of people remained in the street, and the crowd increased in consequence of their attention being drawn to the clearing of the house, and if anything was saying or doing likely to lead to a breach of the peace, the policeman was not only bound to interfere, but it would have been a breach of his duty if he had not done so, and if in so doing he ordered the people to go away, and any one was unwilling, and defied the policeman, and used threatening language, the policeman was perfectly justified in insisting upon that person going off ; and if he had warned him several times, and he would not go away, and used threatening language if anyone ventured to touch him, the policeman was entirely justified in using a degree of violence to push him from the place, in order to get him to go home ; and therefore anything that he did would not be in the nature of an assault, but would be an act in the discharge of his duty, and therefore any blow that was given afterwards with a cutting instrument would be precisely the same as if it had been given without anything being done by the policeman (w).

Upon an indictment for assaulting a policeman in the execution of his duty, it appeared that the policeman was called into a public-house to put an end to a disturbance which the defendant was making ; he and the landlady were at high words ; W. L. interfered, and the defendant was in the act of squaring at him when the policeman desired the defendant not to make a disturbance ; the defendant, who was at the side of the bar, then attempted to go into the parlour, in which a person was sitting ; as the defendant attempted to go into the parlour, the policeman collared him, and prevented him going in ; he then struck the policeman ; neither the landlord or landlady had desired the policeman to turn the defendant out of the house. Parke, B. : ‘ The policeman had a right to be in the house without being called upon either by the landlord or landlady to interfere, but under the circumstances he had no authority to lay hold of the defendant, unless you are satisfied that a breach of the peace was likely to be committed by the defendant on the person in the parlour ; and if you think it was not, it was no part of the policeman’s duty to prevent the defendant from going into the parlour’ (x).

Breaking Doors or Windows.—The right of officers of the law and others to break the doors and windows of dwelling houses or other buildings in order to make an arrest, execute process, or preserve the peace, may be thus stated. Where the right exists it may not be exercised unless there has been a notice of the business on which the officers are come, a demand to enter and a refusal to admit (y). No precise words are needed but enough to give notice that entry is sought under proper authority (z).

A. Criminal Cases.—Where treason or felony has been committed, or a dangerous wound given, the offender’s house is no sanctuary for him ; and the doors may be forced, after notification, demand, and refusal (a). And, where a minister of justice comes armed with process, founded on a breach of the peace, doors may be broken (b). And in the case of any insults to a Court of justice, on which process of contempt is issued, the officer charged with the execution of the process may break open doors, if necessary, in order to execute it (c). And the officer may act in the same manner upon a capias utlagatum, or capias pro fine (d), or upon a habere facias possessionem (e). The same force may be used where a forcible entry or detainer is found by inquisition before justices of the peace, or appears upon their view (f); and also where the proceeding is upon a warrant of a justice of peace, for levying a penalty on a conviction grounded on any statute which gives the whole or any part of such penalty to the King (g).

Though a felony has actually been committed, breaking doors to arrest a person suspected of the crime cannot be justified unless the officer comes armed with a justice's warrant (h), or if the officer acts without warrant he does so at his peril (i).

A plea justifying the entering a house without warrant, the door being open, on suspicion of felony, ought distinctly to shew the purpose for which the house was entered, viz., either in search for the stolen property or to arrest the plaintiff, as well as that there was reason to believe that the stolen property, or the plaintiff, was there (j).

If there is a quarrel or fight in a house, the doors of which are shut, whereby there is likely to be manslaughter or bloodshed, and the constable demands entrance, and is refused by those within, who continue the fight, the constable may break open the doors to keep the peace, and prevent the danger (k); and if there is disorderly drinking or noise in a house at an unseasonable time at night, especially in inns, taverns, or alehouses, the constable on demanding, and being refused entrance, may break open the doors to see and suppress the disorder (l). Where a quarrel or fight is going on in a house in the view or hearing of a constable, or where those who have made an affray in his presence fly to a house, and are immediately pursued by him, and he is not suffered to enter in order to suppress the affray in the first case, or to apprehend the affrayers in either case, he may justify breaking open the doors (m).

B. Civil Suits.—In civil suits, on the principle that a man's house is his castle, an officer cannot in general justify the breaking open of an outer door or window to execute the process, e.g. a feri facias (n). If he does so, he will be a trespasser; and if the occupier of the house resists him, and in the struggle kills him, the offence will be only manslaughter (o); or if the occupier of the house does not know him to be an officer, and has reasonable ground of suspicion that the house is broken with a felonious intent, the killing will not be felony (p).

The maxim above stated is limited (q) in its application (1) to the breach of outward doors or windows; (2) to a breach of the house for the purpose of arresting the occupier or any of his family; and (3) to arrests in the first instance.

1. Outward doors or windows are those intended for the security of the house against persons from without endeavouring to break in (r). If the officer finds the outward door open, or it is opened to him from within, he may then break open the inward door, if he finds that necessary to execute his process (s). Thus, an officer, having entered peaceably at the outer door of the house, has been held justified in breaking open the door of a lodger, who occupied the first and second floors, in order to arrest him (t). And it has been held that a sheriff's officer in execution of mesne process, who had first gained peaceable entrance at the outer door of the house of A., might break open the windows of the room of B., a person residing in such house, who had refused to open the door of the room after being informed by the officer that he had a warrant against him (u). But if the party, against whom the process is issued, is not within the house at the time, the officer can only justify breaking open inner doors in order to search for him, after having first demanded admittance (v). If the person or the goods of the defendant are in the house which the officer has entered, he may break open any door within the house without further demand (w). If, however, the house is the house of a stranger, and not of the defendant, the officer must be careful to ascertain that the person or the goods (according to the nature of the process) of the defendant are within before he breaks open any inner door; as, if they are not, he will not be justified (x). Where an outward door was in part open (being divided into two parts, the lower hatch of which was closed, and the upper part open), and the officer put his arm over the hatch to open the part which was closed, upon which a struggle ensued between him and a friend of the prisoner, and, the officer prevailing, the prisoner shot at and killed him; it was held to be murder (y).

The privilege only extends to the dwelling house, including it would seem all buildings within the curtilage, and considered as parcel of the dwelling-house at common law (z).

2. The privilege in respect to outer doors or windows is confined to cases where the breach of the house is made in order to arrest the occupier or any of his family, who have their ordinary residence there: for if a stranger, whose ordinary residence is elsewhere, upon pursuit, takes refuge in the house of another, this is not the castle of such stranger, nor can he claim in it the benefit of sanctuary (a). But where the doors of strangers are broken open, upon the supposition of the person sought being there, it must be at the peril of finding him there; unless (it would seem) the parties act under a magistrate's warrant (b).

If a sheriff's officer enters the house of the defendant for the purpose of arresting him or taking his goods, he is justified if he has reasonable grounds for believing that the party or his goods are there (c).

3. The privilege is also confined to arrests in the first instance. For if a man who has been legally arrested (d) escapes from the officer, and takes shelter (though in his own house) the officer may, upon fresh pursuit, break open doors in order to retake him, having first given due notice of his business, and demanded admission, and been refused (e). If it be not, however, upon fresh pursuit, it seems that the officer should have a warrant, resolution in the prisoner to resist the officer, whom he afterwards killed in attempting to attach his goods in his dwelling-house, in order to compel an appearance in the County Court. The point reserved related to the legality of the attachment, Vide ante, p. 738.

Bl. 120, it is said that 'it seems to follow from this that, as a house in which the defendant habitually resides is on the same footing with respect to executions as his own house, the sheriff would not be justified in breaking the outer door of such a house, even after demand of admittance and refusal.'

(b) 2 Hale, 103. Fost. 321. 1 East, P. C. 324. Mr. Smith, in the same note, says: 'There may, perhaps, be another case in which the sheriff might justify entering the house of a stranger, upon bare suspicion viz., if the stranger were to use fraud, and to inveigle the sheriff into a belief that the defendant was concealed in his house for the purpose of favouring his escape, while the officers should be detained in searching or for any other reason, it might be held that he could not take advantage of his own deceit so as to treat the sheriff who entered under the false supposition thus induced as a trespasser; or, perhaps, such conduct might be held to amount to a licence to the sheriff to enter.' It certainly is reasonable in such a case that the party should not be permitted to shew that in fact the defendant was not concealed in his house, and this would be in accordance with the principles established by Pickard v. Sears, 6 A. & E. 469. Heane v. Rogers, 9 B. & C. 577, 586. Kieran v. Sanders, 6 A. & E. 515, and Gregg v. Wells, 10 A. & E. 90, in which last case it was held that a party who negligently or culpably stands by and allows another to contract on the faith and understanding of a fact, which he can contradict, cannot afterwards dispute that fact in an action against the person whom he has himself assisted in deceiving.' C. S. G.

(c) Johnson v. Leigh, 6 Taunt. 246. In Morrish v. Murray, 13 M. & W. 52, officers were held not justified in entering and searching the house of a stranger to arrest a man on capias ad satisfaciendum if he was not in the house at the time, though he had resided there, and the officers had reasonable cause to suspect that he was there.

(d) Laying hold of the prisoner and pronouncing the words of arrest, is an actual arrest. Fost. 320. But bare words will not make an arrest; the officer must actually touch the prisoner. Genner v. Sparkes, 1 Salk. 79; 91 E. R. 74. Berry v. Adamson, 6 B. & C. 528.

(e) Fost. 320. Genner v. Sparkes, ubi supra. 1 Hale, 459. 2 Hawk. c. 14, s. 9.

and the officer will not be authorised to break open doors in order to retake a prisoner where the first arrest has been illegal (f). Therefore, where an officer had made an illegal arrest on civil process, and was obliged to retire by the party's snapping a pistol at him several times, and afterwards returned again with assistants, who attempted to force the door, when the party within shot one of the assistants: the killing was ruled to be only manslaughter (g).

Where an officer or his assistants, having entered a house in the execution of their duty, are locked in, they may break open the doors to regain their liberty (h). So where a sheriff being lawfully in a house makes a lawful seizure of the goods of the owner of the house, and cannot take the goods out of the house without opening the outer door, and neither the owner or anyone else is there so that he can request them to open the door, he may break the door open to take out the goods (i).

Where officers in order to execute process illegally break open doors or windows, it is not clear whether to kill them is murder or manslaughter. In Cook's case (j) a bailiff having a warrant to arrest a person upon a capias ad satisfaciendum, came to his house, and gave him notice; upon which the person threatened to shoot him if he did not depart; the bailiff did not depart, but broke open the window to make the arrest, and the person shot him, and killed him. This was held not to be murder, because the officer had no right to break the house; but manslaughter, because the party knew the officer to be a bailiff.

In Curtis' case (k), upon some officers breaking open a shop door to execute an escape warrant, the prisoner, who had previously sworn that the first man that entered should be a dead man, killed one of them immediately by a blow with an axe. A few of the judges to whom this case was referred were of opinion that this would have been murder, even if the warrant had not been legal, and the officers could not have justified the breaking open the door, upon the grounds of the brutal cruelty of the act, and of the deliberation manifested by the prisoner, who, looking out of a window with the axe in his hand, had sworn, before any attempt to enter the shop, that the first man that did enter should be a dead man.

The latter opinion seems correct; for the status of the officers was known and the breaking was at most a trespass and not in the nature of burglary or felonious house-breaking, and the previous threats afforded evidence of deliberation.

The fact that a warrant is illegal (l) may make an attempt to execute it a provocation: but does not necessarily reduce the offence of killing the officer in resisting execution from murder to manslaughter. If the execution can be resisted without proceeding to extremity of violence (m), use of great and unnecessary violence unsuited to the provocation given, or proof of premeditated previous threats or express malice would seem to make killing in such a case murder (n). The true principle seems to be that stated in East that the illegality of an attempt to arrest merely puts the officer on the same footing as any other wrongdoer (o).

When due execution of the law by its known officer is resisted or the officers are attacked to prevent their executing the law, as by arresting or detaining in custody a person when they are legally entitled to take and hold, the persons actually concerned in the resistance or attack are guilty of murder. The person arrested or held is not liable if he yields himself and takes no part in the resistance or attack: but is liable if he does an act in aid or countenance of the attackers or in execution of a common scheme of resistance to the law (p). Questions have arisen as to the law where a stranger intervenes in a struggle to rescue an offender from officers of the law or to resist arrest. It would seem that to kill the stranger would be murder if he intervened with the object of preserving the peace, aiding the officers of the law, and preventing mischief; but that if he intervened in aid of the rescuers and killed an officer of the law in the struggle, it would be murder by the stranger (q).

Every person who wilfully engages in a breach of the peace by assaulting another is bound at his peril first to satisfy himself of the justice of the cause which he espouses; and if he happens to take the part of those resisting the law and to kill an officer of the law or a person acting in his aid or a person lawfully acting in support of the law, it is difficult to extenuate the offence by proof that the slayer had not knowledge or notice of the status of the party killed (r).

When the warrant or other authority under which a peace officer is acting is not sufficient to justify him in arresting or detaining the person whom he has taken or is holding, the officer is not entitled to the peculiar protection afforded by the law to officers acting in the execution of their duty, and if he is killed the crime may be reduced to manslaughter when held not responsible unless it could be proved that after his arrest he encouraged the other to kill the pursuers.

(q) Holt, C.J., and Rooksby, J., at Hertford, temp. Will. III. ad incipium MS. Tracey, 53; 1 East, P. C. 296; and see Fost. 353. In R. v. Willis, 1 Salk. 334, it was ruled that if a man began a riot in which an officer was killed he would be liable as a principal murderer if present at the time of the slaying, though he did not commit the fact. This depends on how far the killing was part of or a natural consequence of the concerted action which led to the riot; vide ante, Bk. i. c. v.; Bk. vi. c. i.

(r) The older authorities and dicta on this subject are collected and discussed, 1 Hawk. c. 31, s. 59; 1 East, P. C. 316, 317. In Sir C. Stanley's case (Sid. 159; Kel. (J.), 86; East, P. C. 318) intervention against a bailiff with the object only to keep the peace was held manslaughter; but in the report in Keble, 584, it is said that it was adjudged, that if any casually assist against the law, and kill the bailiff, it is murder, especially if he knew the cause of the bailiff's action.

the killing is sudden and without premeditation and is attended by circumstances affording reasonable provocation (s). The proposition above stated is now accepted as correctly declaring the law, and as reconciling the divergences of opinion among former judges upon the question how far the person arrested, or third persons, especially mere strangers interfering on behalf of a person illegally arrested or detained, are entitled to rely on the illegality of the arrest to extenuate their guilt in killing the officer.

In Ferrers' case (t), Sir Henry Ferrers being arrested for debt, upon an illegal warrant, his servant, in seeking to rescue him, as was pretended, killed the officer; but, upon the evidence, it appeared clearly that Sir Henry Ferrers, upon the arrest, obeyed, and was put into a house before the fighting between the officer and his servant: wherefore he was found not guilty of murder or manslaughter.

In Hugget's case (u), B. and two other constables impressed a man without a warrant for so doing; to which the man quietly submitted, and went along with them. The prisoner, with three others, seeing them, instantly pursued them, and required to see their warrant; on which B. shewed them a paper, which the prisoner and his associates said was no warrant, and immediately drew their swords to rescue the impressed man, and thrust at B.; whereupon B. and his two companions drew their swords, and a fight ensued, in which Hugget killed B. But this case is stated very differently by Lord Hale, as having been under the following circumstances:—A press-master seized B. for a soldier; and, with the assistance of C., laid hold of him. D. finding fault with the rudeness of C., there grew a quarrel between them, and D. killed C.; and by the advice of eight judges against four, it was ruled that this was but manslaughter.

In R. v. Tooley (v) B., who was a parish constable, came into another parish, where he was no constable, and consequently had no authority (w); and there arrested a woman, under suspicion of being a disorderly person, but who had not misbehaved herself, and against whom B. had no warrant. The prisoners came up; and though they were all strangers to the woman drew their swords, and assaulted B., for the purpose of rescuing the woman from his custody; upon which he shewed them his constable's staff, declared that he was about the Queen's business, and intended them no harm. The prisoners then put up their swords; and B. carried the woman to the round-house in Covent Garden. A short time afterwards, the woman being still in the round-house, the prisoners drew who held it manslaughter put the point as an endeavour to rescue, and that undue arrest or restraint of the liberty of any person is a provocation to all men of England. In R. v. Mawgridge, Kel. (J.) 136, Hugget's case is treated as having settled the law.

their swords again, and assaulted B., on account of her imprisonment, and to get her discharged. B. called some persons to his assistance, to keep the woman in custody, and to defend himself from the violence of the prisoners; upon which a person named D. came to his assistance; and before any stroke received, one of the prisoners gave D. while assisting the constable, a mortal wound. This case was elaborately argued, and the judges were divided in opinion; seven of them holding that the offence was manslaughter only, and five that it was murder. The seven judges who held that it was manslaughter thought that it was a sudden action, without any precedent malice or apparent design of doing hurt, but only to prevent the imprisonment of the woman and to rescue her who was unlawfully restrained of her liberty; and that it could not be murder, if the woman was unlawfully imprisoned (x); and they also thought that the prisoners, in this case, had sufficient provocation on the ground that if one be imprisoned upon an unlawful authority, it is a sufficient provocation to all people out of compassion, and much more where it is done under a colour of justice; and that, where the liberty of the subject is invaded, it is a provocation to all the subjects of England. But the five judges who differed thought that, the woman being a stranger to the prisoners, it could not be a provocation to them; otherwise if she had been a friend or servant; and that it would be dangerous to allow such a power of interference to the mob. The majority of the judges relied on Hugget's case and Ferrers' case (y).

In R. v. Osmer (z) a man was arrested on a good warrant by a person described as sergeant at mace, who had no authority to execute it. The defendant was convicted of assaulting the sergeant, but the conviction was held bad, Ellenborough, C.J., saying: 'If a man without authority attempts to arrest another illegally it is a breach of the peace, and any other person may lawfully interfere to prevent it, doing no more than is necessary for the purpose.'

In R. v. Phelps (a), on an indictment for the murder of a person who was assisting a police officer to take P. to the station house it appeared that P. was arrested on suspicion of having stolen potatoes from a garden. As the police had not found P. committing the offence, and it was not a felony, Coltman, J., ruled that the arrest was illegal and the killing manslaughter only.

The conclusions of the majority of the judges in Tooley's case were severely criticised by Foster, J., who considered that they were not warranted by Hugget's case or Ferrers' case, and carried the law in favour of private persons officiously interfering in cases of illegal arrest further than was warranted by sound reason or true policy (b). After observing that in Hugget's case (c) swords were drawn, a mutual combat ensued, the blood was heated before the mortal wound was given, and a rescue seemed to be practicable at the time the affray began; whereas, though in Tooley's case, the prisoners had, at the meeting, drawn their swords against the constable unarmed, they had put them up again, appearing to be pacified, and cool reflection seeming to have taken place; and it was at the second meeting that the deceased received his death wound, before a blow was given or offered by him or any of his party; and also in that case there was no possibility of rescue, the woman having been secured in the round-house; he says, that the second assault on the constable seems rather to have been grounded upon resentment, or a principle of revenge, for what had before passed, than upon any hope or endeavour to assist the woman. He then proceeds: 'Now, what was the case of Tooley and his accomplices, stript of a pomp of words, and the colourings of artificial reasoning? They saw a woman, for aught appears, a perfect stranger to them, led to the round-house under a charge of a criminal nature. This, upon evidence at the Old Bailey, a month or two afterwards, comes out to be an illegal arrest and imprisonment, a violation of Magna Charta; and these ruffians are presumed to have been seized, all on a sudden, with a strong fit of zeal for Magna Charta (d) and the laws; and in this frenzy to have drawn upon the constable, and stabbed his assistant. It is extremely difficult to conceive that the violation of Magna Charta, a fact of which they were totally ignorant at the time, could be the provocation which led them into this outrage. But, admitting for argument sake that it was, we all know that words of reproach, how grating and offensive soever, are in the eye of the law no provocation in the case of voluntary homicide; and yet every man who hath considered the human frame, or but attended to the workings of his own heart, knows that affronts of that kind pierce deeper, and stimulate the veins more effectually, than a slight injury done to a third person, though under colour of justice, possibly can. The indignation that kindles in the breast in one case is instinct, it is human infirmity; in the other it may possibly, be called a concern for the common rights of the subject; but this concern, when well founded, is rather founded in reason and cool reflection, than in human infirmity; and it is to human infirmity alone that the law indulges in the case of a sudden provocation.' He then proceeds further: 'But if a passion for the common rights of the subject, in the case of individuals, must, against all experience, be presumed to inflame beyond a personal affront, let us suppose the case of an upright and deserving man, universally beloved and esteemed, standing at the place of execution, under a sentence of death manifestly unjust. This is a case that may well rouse the indignation, and excite the compassion, of the wisest and best men; but wise and good men know that it is the duty of private subjects to leave the innocent man to his lot, how hard soever it may be, without attempting a rescue; for otherwise all government would be unhinged. And yet, what proportion doth the case of a false imprisonment, for a short time, and for which the injured party may have an adequate remedy, bear to that I have now put?' (e)

In R. v. Adey (f), the prisoner, who cohabited with a person named F.,

(d) Holt, C.J., in delivering the judgment in Tooley's case, had said: 'Sure a man ought to be concerned for Magna Charta and the laws: and if any one against the law imprison a man, he is an offender against Magna Charta.'

(f) 1 Leach, 206. At p. 212 it is said that the prisoner lay eighteen months in gaol, and was then discharged; but the following note is added: 'It is said, that the judges held it to be manslaughter only, killed an assistant of a constable, who came to apprehend F., as an idle and disorderly person, under 19 Geo. II. c. 10. (g), though he was not an object of the Act, and did not himself make any resistance to the arrest; but the prisoner, immediately upon the constable and his assistant requiring F. to go along with them, without making use of any argument to induce them to desist, or saying one word to prevent the intended arrest, stabbed the assistant. Hotham, B., with whom Gould, J., and Ashhurst, J., concurred, held the offence to be murder. A special verdict, however, was found (h); and the case was argued in the Exchequer Chamber, before ten of the judges; but no opinion was ever publicly delivered.

The opinion of Foster seems to have been accepted by Alderson, B., who said in R. v. Warner (i) that Tooley's case was overruled, and by Pollock, C.B., in R. v. Davis (j), and is approved by Sir James Stephen (k), and appears to be established as the accepted rule by R. v. Allen (l). In that case K. and D. had been arrested on suspicion of felony (m), and were from time to time remanded on a warrant charging them generally with felony but not specifying any particular offence. While they were being driven in a police van to prison a rescue was attempted—in the course of which a constable was killed. On an indictment of A. and but no opinion was ever publicly given; and qu., whether the prisoner did not escape pending the opinion of the judges, when the gaol was burnt down in 1780, and was never retaken.' And see also 1 East, P. C. 329, note (d), where it is said: 'Upon inquiry, however, it appears that, pending the consideration of the case by the judges, she escaped during the riots in 1780, and was never retaken.' In R. v. Porter (reported as to another point, 9 C. & P. 778), upon an indictment for murder, it appeared that the deceased, who was a watchman, and another were taking a person towards a station-house on a charge of robbing a garden, and were proceeding quietly along a road, the prisoner making no resistance, when they were attacked and the deceased beaten to death. In opening the case it was asserted, that even if the prisoner were not lawfully in custody, the offence was murder; for if a person were illegally in custody, and was making no resistance, no person had any right to attack the persons who had him in custody, and that if they did, and death ensued in consequence of the violence used to release the prisoner, it was murder; and that, although there might be old cases to the contrary, they were no longer considered as binding authorities. The point, however, did not ultimately become material, as it was held that the party was in lawful custody; but the above position was neither controverted by the very learned judge who tried the case, nor by the prisoner's counsel; and it would seem that it could not be successfully disputed, for it is difficult to discover upon what principle any individual can be justified in interfering to prevent what apparently is the due execution of the law, and that the question, whether he is guilty of murder or manslaughter, if death ensue, is to depend upon whether the custody is legal or illegal, of which, probably, at the time, he was perfectly ignorant, and which, consequently, could in no respect influence his conduct. A parcel containing revolvers was thrown by an unknown person into the cab, a struggle with the constables in charge ensued in which one was killed by a shot fired by one of the three prisoners, it was not ascertainable by which. Held that the act being done by one of the three acting in concert, R. was guilty of murder.

others for the murder of the constable it was contended that K. and D. were not in legal custody and that consequently the killing of the constable in the attempt to rescue them was manslaughter only. Blackburn and Mellor, JJ., directed the jury to convict of murder, and on a conviction, after consulting the other judges, refused to reserve a case. In giving the reasons for their refusal they laid down the rule stated ante pp. 721, 750, and distinguished the cases of Ferrers, Hugget and Tooley, relied on for the defence as applying only in the case of a sudden or unpremeditated affray where the fact of unwarranted arrest might be a sufficient provocation and the parties might act without any previous malice or design of doing hurt (n). And they added that the convicts had formed a deliberate prearranged conspiracy to attack the police with fire-arms and shoot them if necessary for the purpose of rescuing K. and D., and well knew that the police were acting in obedience to the commands of a justice who had full power to remand K. and D. to gaol if he made a proper warrant for the purpose. 'We think it would be monstrous to suppose that under such circumstances, even if the justice did make an informal warrant, it would justify the slaughter of an officer in charge of the prisoners or reduce that slaughter to the crime of manslaughter.'

SECT. IX.—OF KILLING IN THE PROSECUTION OF SOME CRIMINAL, UNLAWFUL, OR WANTON PURPOSE.

As a general principle, subject to the qualifications presently to be stated, if an action, unlawful in itself, is done deliberately, and with intent to cause mischief or great bodily harm to particular individuals, or indiscriminate mischief, and some person is killed in consequence of the act, even against or beside the original intention of the slayer, he is in law guilty of murder (o).

Under this head fall cases in which particular malice directed against one person falls by mistake or accident upon another. Though the death caused under such circumstances may in a loose way be called accidental, the law does not so regard it. Thus if B. is killed by means which were in fact intended to kill or injure A., whether by poison, blow, or any other means, the killing of B. is murder if the killing of A. would have been so (p). Thus, if C., having malice against A., strikes at and misses him, but kills B., this is murder in C. (q); and, if A. and B. engage in a deliberate duel, and a stranger coming between them to part them is killed by one of them, it is murder in the party killing (r). And where A.

out of Dallison's Report, p. 217. But Hale thinks that it is not murder in both, unless both struck him who came to part them, and says that by the book of 22 Ass. 71, Coron. 180 (which seems to be the case more at large) he only that gave the stroke had judgment, and was executed. 1 Hale, 441, to which this note is subjoined: 'The other does not appear to have been before the Court; but, upon putting the case, the Court said he that struck is guilty of felony, but said nothing as to him who did not strike.'

had malice against D., the master of B., and assaulted him, and upon B. the servant coming to the aid of his master, A. kills B., it was held murder in A. as much as if he had killed the master (s). So, where A. gave a poisoned apple to his wife intending to poison her, and the wife, ignorant of the matter, gave it to a child who took it and died; this was held murder in A., though he, being present at the time, endeavoured to dissuade his wife from giving the apple to the child (t). Where A. mixed poison in an electuary sent by an apothecary to her husband, with intent to poison him, which did not kill him, but afterwards killed the apothecary who to vindicate his reputation tasted it himself, having first stirred it about, some doubt was entertained, because the apothecary, of his own hand, without incitement from anyone, not only partook of the electuary, but mingled it together, so as to incorporate the poison, and make its operation more forcible than the mixture as made by the wife of A. But ultimately the judges resolved that A. was guilty of murder, for the putting the poison into the electuary was the cause of the death: and if a person prepares poison with intent to kill any human being, such person is guilty of the murder of any one who is killed thereby (u). So if A. puts poison into wine, with intent to kill B., and C. drinks the wine and dies, A. is guilty of the murder of C.; and it makes no difference that the wine, unless stirred up, would not have killed C., and that C., thinking there was sugar in it, stirred it up (v).

So, where a person gave medicine to a woman to procure abortion (w), and where a person put skewers into the womb of a woman for the same purpose (x), by which in both cases the women were killed, these acts were held murder; for though the death of the woman was not intended, the acts were deliberate and malicious, and necessarily attended with great danger to the person on whom they were practised.

Where the prisoner was indicted for the wilful murder of a woman, and it appeared that the woman had died as a result of the prisoner having injected mercury or used other means upon her with the intention of procuring abortion, Bigham, J., told the jury: 'If you are of opinion that the girl died as a result of the prisoner's unlawful operation, he is guilty of murder . . . I do not mean to say that there are not some cases where this rule of law is not applicable. There may be cases where death is so remote a contingency that no reasonable man could have taken it into his consideration. . . . If you can think that though the prisoner may have administered the injection, he nevertheless could not have contemplated that it could have resulted in death, then he is not guilty of the graver charge, but is guilty of the lesser crime of manslaughter' (y).

Even where no mischief is intended to any particular individual, if there is a general malice or depraved inclination to mischief, fall where it may; the act itself being unlawful, attended with probable serious danger, and done with a mischievous intent to hurt people, the killing is in law murder (z). Thus, if a man deliberately, and with intent to do mischief, rides upon a horse used to kick, or coolly discharges a gun, among a multitude of people, and death results, it will be murder (a). So, if a man resolves to kill the next man he meets, and does kill him, it is murder, although he knew him not; for this is universal malice (b). Upon the same principle, if a man, knowing that people are passing along the street, throws a stone likely to do injury, or shoots over a house or wall with intent to do hurt to people, and one is thereby slain, it is murder on account of the previous malice, though not directed against any particular individual; for it is no excuse that the party was bent upon mischief generally (c).

It has been said that whenever an unlawful act (an act malum in se), is done in prosecution of a felonious intention, and death ensues, it will be murder: as if A. shoots at the poultry of B. intending to steal the poultry, and by accident kills a man, this will be murder by reason of the felonious intention of stealing (d). But Holt, C.J., said that the dictum of Coke (3 Inst. 56), was too large and that 'there must be a design of mischief to the person, as to commit a great riot' (e). And upon an indictment for murder against a man who had set fire to his house with intent to defraud his insurers, and had thereby caused the death of an imbecile son of his, Stephen, J., said: 'I think that, instead of saying that an act done with intent to commit a felony and which causes death amounts to murder, it would be reasonable to say that any act known to be dangerous to life and likely in itself to cause death done for the purpose of committing a felony which caused death, should be murder' (f). And it has been held, that if such offenders as were mentioned in 21 Edw. I., st. 2 (h) (De malefactoribus in parcis), killed the keeper, &c., it was murder in all, although the keeper ordered them to stand, assaulted them first, and they fled, and did not turn till one of the keeper's men had fired and hurt one of their companions (i).

(d) Fost. 258, 259.¹ Coke (3 Inst. 56) says: 'If the act be unlawful it is murder; as if A., meaning to steal a deer in the park of B., shoots at the deer, and by the glance of the arrow kills a boy that is hidden in a bush, this is murder; for that the act is unlawful,' and he cites Bract. Lib. 3. 120b. And then he draws the distinction between shooting wild fowl and shooting at any tame fowl, and says, if the arrow by misadventure kills a man, it is murder; and cites for the latter position 3 Edw. III. Coron. 354, 2 Hen. IV. 18, and 11 Hen. VII. 23. Hale (1, 38) cites 11 Hen. (h) Repealed in 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27). 1 Hale, 491.

(i) 1 East, P. C. 256, citing 1 MS. Sum. 145, 175. Sum. 37, 46. Palm. 546. 2 Roll. Rep. 120. The reason is, the Act provides that, if after hue and cry made to

It has been shewn, that where death ensues from an act done in the prosecution of a felonious intention, it will be murder (j) ; but a distinction is taken in the case of an act done with the intent only of committing a bare trespass ; as if death ensues from such act, the offence will be only manslaughter (k). Thus, if A. shoots at the poultry of B., intending to steal them, and by accident kill a man, it will be murder ; yet, if he shoots at them wantonly, and without any such felonious intention, and accidentally kills a man, the offence will be only manslaughter (l). And any one, who voluntarily, knowingly, and unlawfully, intends hurt to the person of another, though he does not intend death, yet, if death ensues is guilty of murder or manslaughter, according to the circumstances or the nature of the instrument used, and the manner of using it, as calculated to produce great bodily harm or not (m). And if a man is doing an unlawful act, though not intending bodily harm to any one (as if he is throwing a stone at another's horse), and hits a person and kills him, it is manslaughter (n).

Incendiarism.—Where a man set fire to a house whereby a person was burnt to death it was held murder (o). On an indictment for murder it appeared that the prisoner had set fire to a stack of straw, in an enclosure in which was an outhouse or barn, but not adjoining to any house. While the fire was burning, the deceased was seen in the flames, and his body was afterwards found in the enclosure. There was no evidence who he was, or how or when he came there, nor whether he had been in the outhouse or merely lying on or beside the stack : nor was there evidence that the prisoner had any idea that any one was, or was likely to be, there, and when he saw the deceased, he wanted to save him. It did not exactly appear how long the fire had been kindled before it was discovered, but very soon after it was discovered the deceased was seen in the flames. Bramwell, B., told the jury that ' the law laid down was that where a prisoner, in the course of committing a felony, caused the death of a human being, that was murder, even though he did not intend it. And though that may appear unreasonable, yet, as it is laid down as the law, it is our duty to act upon it. The law, however, is that a man is not answerable except for the natural and probable result of his own act ; and therefore, if you should not be satisfied that the deceased was in the farm or enclosure at the time the prisoner set fire to the stack, but came in afterwards, then, as his own act intervened between the death and the act of the prisoner, his death could not be the natural result of the prisoner's act. And in that view he ought to be acquitted on the present charge ' (p).

Grievous Bodily Harm.—Where the intent is to do some great bodily stand, they will not yield, but flee or defend themselves, and the keepers kill them in taking them, they shall not be troubled in any way for it. Therefore all that the keepers did in this case was lawful, and consequently the killing was the killing of a party in the due execution of his duty.

harm to another, and death ensues, it will be murder; as if A. intends only to beat B. in anger, or from preconceived malice, and happens to kill him, it will be no excuse that he did not intend all the mischief that followed; for what he did was malum in se, and he must be answerable for all its consequences. He beat B. with an intention of doing him some bodily harm, and is therefore answerable for all the harm he did (q). So if a large stone is thrown at one with a deliberate intention to hurt, though not to kill him, and by accident it kills him, or any other, this is murder (r). If a wrongful act (an act which the party who commits it can neither justify nor excuse) is done under circumstances which shew an intent to kill, or to do any serious injury, or any general malice, the offence is murder (s). But the nature of the instrument, and the manner of using it, as calculated to produce great bodily harm or not, will vary the offence in all such cases (t).

Practical Jokes.—Upon an indictment for murder it appeared that the deceased, being in liquor, had gone at night into a glass-house, and laid himself down upon a chest; and that while he was there asleep the prisoners covered and surrounded him with straw, and threw a shovel of hot cinders upon his belly; the consequence of which was that the straw ignited, and he was burnt to death. There was no evidence of express malice, but the conduct of the prisoners indicated an entire recklessness of consequences, hardly consistent with anything short of design. Patteson, J., adverted to the fact of there being no evidence of express malice, but told the jury that if they believed the prisoners really intended to do any serious injury to the deceased, although not to kill him, it was murder; but if they believed their intention to have been only to frighten him in sport it was manslaughter (u).

Where Several join to do an Unlawful Act.—Where several persons come to a resolution to resist all opposers in the commission of a breach of the peace, and to execute it in a manner naturally tending to create riot or tumult, e.g. by going to beat a man, or rob a park, or standing in opposition to the sheriff's posse, they must, at their peril, abide the event of their actions. And therefore if in doing any of these acts they happen to kill a man, they are all guilty of murder (v). But in order to make the killing by any, murder in all, of those who are confederated together for an unlawful purpose, merely on account of the unlawful act done or in contemplation, it must happen during the actual strife or unlawful enterprise, or at least within such a reasonable time afterwards as may leave it probable that no fresh provocation intervened (w).

The fatal act must appear to have been committed strictly in prosecution of the purpose for which the party was assembled; and therefore, if several persons be engaged in an unlawful act, and one of them takes the opportunity to kill one of his companions against whom he bears deliberate malice, the rest are not concerned in the guilt of that act, because it had no connection with the crime in contemplation (x). Two men were beating another man in the street, and a stranger made some remark upon the cruelty of the act, upon which one of the two men gave him a mortal stab with a knife. On an indictment of both men as principals in the murder; the judge held that although both were doing an unlawful act in beating the man, yet as the death of the stranger did not ensue upon that act, and as it appeared that only one of them intended any injury to the person killed, the other could not be guilty either as principal or accessory (y).

Where a party of smugglers were met and opposed by an officer of the Crown, and during the scuffle which ensued a gun was discharged by a smuggler, which killed one of his own gang, the question was, whether the whole gang were guilty of this murder. The Court agreed that if the King's officer, or any of his assistants, had been killed by the shot, it would have been murder in all the gang; and also, that if it had appeared that the shot was levelled at the officer, or any of his assistants, it would also have amounted to murder in the whole of the gang, though an accomplice of their own were the person killed (z). The point upon which the case turned was, that it did not appear from any of the facts found that the gun was discharged in prosecution of the purpose for which the party was assembled (a). In another case the prisoners had been hired by a tenant to assist him in carrying away his household furniture in order to avoid a distress. They accordingly assembled for this purpose armed with bludgeons and other offensive weapons; and a violent affray took place between them and the landlord of the house, who, accompanied on his part by another set of men, came to prevent the removal of the goods. The constable was called in and produced his authority, but could not induce them to disperse: and, while they were fighting in the street, one of the company, but which of them was not known, killed a boy who was standing at his father's door looking on, but totally unconcerned in the affray. The question was raised whether this was murder in all the company; but the majority of the judges held, that as the boy was found to be unconcerned in the affray, his having been killed by one of the company could not possibly affect the rest; for the homicide did not happen in prosecution of the illegal act (b). This opinion seems to have been based on the view that there was no evidence to shew that the stroke by which the boy was killed was either levelled at any of the opposing party, or was levelled at him upon the supposition that he was one of the opponents, and therefore that it was not given in prosecution of the purpose for which the party was assembled (c).

The prisoners, eight in number, each having a gun, upon being found poaching by some keepers, who went towards them for the purpose of apprehending them, formed into two lines, and pointed their guns at the keepers, saying that they would shoot them. A shot was then fired which wounded a keeper, but no other shot was fired. It was objected that it was clear that there was no common intent to shoot this man, because only one gun was fired instead of the whole number. Vaughan, B., said: 'That is rather a question for the jury, but still on this evidence it is quite clear what the common purpose was. They all draw up in lines, and point their guns at the gamekeepers, and they are all giving their countenance and assistance to the one who actually fires the gun. If it could be shewn that either of them separated himself from the rest, and shewed distinctly that he would have no hand in what they were doing, the objection would have much weight in it' (d). Two private watchmen seeing the prisoner and another man with two carts laden with apples, which they suspected had been stolen, went up to them, and one walked beside the prisoner, and one beside the other man, at some distance from each other, and while they were so going along, the prisoner's companion stepped back, and with a bludgeon wounded the watchman he had been walking with. Garrow, B., said: 'To make the prisoner a principal the jury must be satisfied that when he and his companion went out with a common illegal purpose of stealing apples, they also entertained the common guilty purpose of resisting to death, or with extreme violence, any persons who might endeavour to apprehend them; but if they had only the common purpose of stealing apples, and the violence of the prisoner's companion was merely the result of the situation in which he found himself, and proceeded from the impulse of the moment, without any previous concert, the prisoner will be entitled to an acquittal' (e).

Where the whole of a party of poachers set upon and beat a keeper till he was senseless, and having left him lying on the ground, one of them after they had gone a little distance returned, and stole his money, it was held that he alone was guilty of larceny (f). Where two poachers were apprehended by some gamekeepers, and being in custody called out to one of their companions, who came to their assistance and killed one of the gamekeepers, it was held that this was murder in all, though the blow was struck while the two were actually in custody, but that it would not have been so if the two had acquiesced and remained passive in custody (g).

Where four poachers were met by a keeper and his assistant, and after some words had passed, three of them ran in upon the keeper, knocked him down and stunned him; and when he recovered himself, he saw all of them coming by him, and one said, 'Damn 'em we've done 'em'; and when they had got two or three paces beyond him, one of them turned back and wounded the keeper in the leg, and then the men set off and ran away; Bolland, B., told the jury if they thought the prisoners were acting in concert, they were all equally guilty of inflicting the wound (h).

Where, upon an indictment for maliciously cutting, the question was, how far one prisoner was concurring in the act of the other; Park, J., told the jury that 'If three persons go out to commit a felony, and one of them, unknown to the others, puts a pistol in his pocket, and commits a felony of another kind, such as murder, the two who did not concur in this second felony will not be guilty thereof, notwithstanding it happened while they were engaged with him in the felonious act for which they went out' (i).

Where on an indictment for murder it appeared that the deceased was found tied hand and foot with string, and something forced into her throat, by which she had been suffocated, and the house in which she was had been forcibly entered, and the object evidently had been robbery; the jury were told that if they were satisfied that the deceased met with her death from violence by any person or persons to enable them to commit a burglary or any other felony, although they who inflicted the violence might not have intended to kill her, all who were parties to that violence were guilty of murder (j).

The prisoner was indicted for manslaughter. A. began a quarrel with the deceased, and called C. out of a public-house, and both went after the deceased into a cellar and began to beat him with their fists. In the course of the fight the deceased received from one or other of the men a blow from a piece of timber which was in the cellar. A. was tried and convicted of manslaughter, and Cleasby, B., is reported to have ruled that A., having invited C. down into the cellar to beat the deceased, was answerable for whatever was done afterwards. Lush, J., is reported to have said that might be so, and yet that C. would not be responsible for all that A. did. If two men concerted together to fight two other men with their fists, and one struck an unlucky blow causing death, both would be guilty of manslaughter. But if one used a knife or other deadly weapon, such as this piece of timber, without the knowledge or consent of the other, he only who struck with the weapon would be responsible for the death resulting from the blow given by it (k).

Byles, J., is reported to have directed the grand jury that, "as the poachers were not engaged in a felony, the use of the flail with violence might reduce the offence to manslaughter." It is perfectly clear that there is no such distinction known to the law as to the manner of arrest between cases of felony and misdemeanor, where the right to arrest at the time and place, and by the person attempting it, exists; and an attack with such a dangerous instrument as a flail, in order to arrest any one for a felony, would clearly reduce the offence to manslaughter; it is plain there was no reason for drawing any such distinction, and therefore the report is probably erroneous.' C. S. G. See R. v. Skeet, 4 F. & F. 931.

(k) R. v. Caton, 12 Cox, 624. See R. v. Turner, 4 F. & F. 339, where Channell, B., ruled that it was otherwise on a charge of manslaughter. The ruling of Lush, J., seems correct. In R. v. Price, 8 Cox, 96, Byles, J., directed the jury as to the responsibility for homicide in a case where a sailor, who was being maltreated by a gang of six other sailors, was stabbed with a knife by one of them. But the report of the case is too inaccurate to make the case of any value as an authority.

SECT. X.—OF KILLING IN CONSEQUENCE OF SOME LAWFUL ACT BEING CRIMINALLY OR IMPROPERLY PERFORMED, OR OF SOME ACT PERFORMED WITHOUT LAWFUL AUTHORITY.

Officers of Justice Acting Improperly.—The special protection given by the law to ministers of justice, in the execution of their duties, has already been stated (l), but it is lost if they misconduct themselves in the discharge of their duty. Thus, though in cases civil or criminal, an officer may repel force by force, where his authority to arrest or imprison is resisted, and will be justified in so doing even if death should be the consequence (m); yet he ought not to proceed to extremities upon every slight interruption, nor without reasonable necessity (n). And if he should kill where no resistance is made, it will be murder: and it is presumed that the offence would be of the same magnitude if he should kill a party after the resistance is over and the necessity has ceased, provided that sufficient time has elapsed for the blood to have cooled (o). Again, though where a felon flying from justice is killed by the officer in the pursuit, the homicide is justifiable if the felon could not be otherwise overtaken (p); yet where a party is accused of a misdemeanor only, and flies from the arrest, the officer must not kill him, though there is a warrant to apprehend him, and though he cannot otherwise be overtaken; and if he does kill him, it will in general be murder (q); but, it may amount only to manslaughter, if it appears that death was not intended (r).

So, in civil suits, if the party against whom the process is issued, flies from the officer endeavouring to arrest him, or if he flies after being arrested or taken in execution, and the officer not being able to overtake him makes use of any deadly weapon, and by so doing, or by other means, intentionally kills him in the pursuit, it will amount to murder (s). But if the officer, in the heat of the pursuit, and merely in order to overtake the party, should trip up his heels, or give him a stroke with an ordinary cudgel, or other weapon not likely to kill, and death should unhappily ensue, this will not amount to more than manslaughter, if, in some cases, even to that offence (t).

Where a collector, having distrained for a duty, laid hold of a maid-servant who stood at the door to prevent the distress being carried away, and beat her head and back several times against the door-post, of which she died; although the Court held her opposition to the officer to be a sufficient provocation to extenuate the homicide, yet they were clearly of opinion that he was guilty of manslaughter in so far exceeding the necessity of the case (u).

An officer in the impress service put one of his seamen on board a boat belonging to C., a fisherman, with intent to bring it under the stern of another vessel, in order too see if there were any fit objects of the impress service on board. The boat steered away in another direction ; and the officer pursued in another vessel for three hours, firing several shots at her, with a musket loaded with ball, for the purpose of hitting the hal-yards, and bringing the boat to, which was found to be the usual way, and one of the shots unfortunately killed C. The Court said it was impossible for it to be more than manslaughter (v). It is presumed that this decision proceeded on the grounds that the musket was not levelled at the deceased, nor any bodily hurt intended to him : but that as such an act was calculated to breed danger, and not warranted by the law, though no bodily hurt were intended, the killing was manslaughter (w). By the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36) it is provided, s. 181, that 'If any ship or boat liable to seizure or examination under the Customs Acts shall not bring to on being required so to do the master of such ship or boat shall forfeit the sum of £20 : and on such ship or boat being chased by any vessel or boat in His Majesty's navy, having the proper pendant and ensign of His Majesty's ships hoisted, or by any vessel or boat duly employed for the prevention of smuggling, having a proper pendant and ensign hoisted, it shall be lawful for the captain, master, or other person, having the charge or command of such vessel in His Majesty's navy, or employed as aforesaid (first causing a gun to be fired as a signal), to fire at or into such vessel or boat ; and such captain, master, or other person, acting in his aid, or by his direction, shall be, and is hereby indemnified and discharged from any indictment, penalty, action, or other proceeding for so doing (x).

If an officer makes an arrest out of his proper district (except under authority of statute), or if an officer has no warrant or authority at all, he is not entitled to the special protection of the law ; and if he purposely kills the party for not submitting to such illegal arrest, it will be murder in all cases, at least where an indifferent person acting in the like manner, without any such pretence, would be guilty to that extent (y).

So if a court-martial orders a man to be flogged where it has no jurisdiction, and the flogging kills the man, the members who concurred in that order are guilty of murder (z).

It is no excuse for killing a man that he was out at night as a ghost dressed in white for the purpose of alarming the neighbourhood. The neighbourhood of H. had been alarmed by what was supposed to be a ghost ; the prisoner went out with a loaded gun to take the ghost ; and upon meeting with a person dressed in white, immediately shot him. M'Donald, C.B., Rooke and Lawrence, JJ., were clear that this was murder, as the person who appeared as a ghost was only guilty of a misdemeanor ; and no one might kill him, though he could not otherwise be taken. The jury, however, brought in a verdict of manslaughter ; but the Court said that they could not receive that verdict ; and told the jury that if they believed the evidence they must find the prisoner guilty of murder ; and if they did not believe the evidence, they should acquit the prisoner. The jury then found the prisoner guilty (a).

Upon a trial for murder, it appeared that the prisoner, an excise officer being in the execution of his office, had seized with the assistance of another person, two smugglers in the act of landing whiskey, contrary to law. The deceased had surrendered himself quietly into the hands of the prisoner, but shortly afterwards, when the prisoner was off his guard, he assaulted him violently with an ash stick, which cut his head severely in several places, and he lost much blood, and was greatly weakened in the struggle which succeeded. The officer, fearing the deceased would overpower him, and having no other means of defending himself, discharged a pistol at the deceased's legs, in the hopes of deterring him from any further attack, but the discharge did not take effect, and the deceased prepared to make another assault. Seeing this, the prisoner warned him to keep off, telling him that he must shoot him if he did not ; but the deceased disregarded the warning, and rushed towards him to make a fresh attack ; he thereupon fired a second pistol and killed him. Holroyd, J., told the jury, ' An officer must not kill for an escape, where the party is in custody for a misdemeanor ; but if the prisoner had reasonable ground for believing himself to be in peril of his own life, or of bodily harm, and no other weapon was at hand to make use of, or if he was rendered incapable of making use of such weapon by the previous violence that he had received, then he was justified. If an affray arises, and blows are received, and weapons used in heat, and death ensues although the party may have been at the commencement in the prosecution of something unlawful, still it would be manslaughter in the killer. In this case it is admitted that the custody was lawful. The question is, whether, under all the circumstances, the deceased being in the prosecution of an illegal act, and having made the first assault, the prisoner had such reasonable occasion to resort to a deadly weapon to defend himself, as any reasonable man might fairly and naturally be expected to resort to ' (b).

Gaolers and their officers are under the same special protection as other ministers of justice ; but in regard to the great power which they have over their prisoners, the law watches their conduct with a jealous eye, and they must not exceed the necessity of the case in the execution of their duty. The coroner must hold an inquest upon the body of every person who dies in prison (c). If the death was owing to cruel and oppressive usage upon the part of the officer of the prison, or, to speak in the language of the law, to duress of imprisonment, it will be deemed wilful murder in the person actually guilty of such duress (d).

A gaoler, knowing that prisoner infected with the small-pox lodged in a certain room in the prison, confined another prisoner against his will in the same room. The second prisoner, who had not had the disease, of which fact the gaoler had notice, caught the disease, and died of it; this was held to be murder (e).

H., the warden of the Fleet prison, appointed one G. as his lawful deputy, G. had a servant, B., whose business it was to take care of the prisoners, and particularly of one A.; and B. put A. into a new-built room, over the common sewer, the walls of which were damp and unwholesome, and kept him without fire, chamber pot, or other necessary convenience, for forty-four days, when he died. It appeared that B. knew the unwholesome situation of the room, and that H. knew the condition of the room fifteen days at least before the death of A., as he had been once present at the prison, and seen A. under such duress of imprisonment, and turned away; at which time B. shut the door of the room, in which A. continued till he died. It was found that A. had sickened and died by duress of imprisonment, and that during the time G. was deputy, H. sometimes acted as warden. Upon these facts the Court were clearly of opinion that B. was guilty of murder. But they thought that H. was not guilty, as it could not be inferred, from merely seeing the deceased once during his confinement, that H. knew that his situation was occasioned by the improper treatment, or that he consented to the continuance of it; and they said, that it was material that the species of duress, by which the deceased came to his death, could not be known by a bare looking-in upon him. H. could not know the circumstances under which he was placed in the room against his consent, or the length of his confinement, or how long he had been without the decent necessities of life: and it was likewise material that no application was made to H., which perhaps might have altered the case. And the Court seemed also to think that as B. was the servant of G., and G. had the actual management of the prison, the accidental presence of the principal would not amount to a revocation of the authority of the deputy (f).

An assault upon a gaoler, which would warrant him (apart from personal danger) in killing a prisoner, must, it should seem, be such from whence he might reasonably apprehend that an escape was intended, which he could not otherwise prevent (g).

Execution of Sentence.—In the execution of sentence upon criminals, the execution ought not to vary from the judgment; for if it does, the officer will be guilty of a felony at least, if not of murder (h). And in conformity to this rule, it has been held, that if the judgment were to be hanged, and the officer beheaded the party, it was murder (i); and that even the King could not change the punishment of the law by altering the hanging or burning into beheading, though, when beheading was part of the sentence, the King might remit the rest (j). But others have thought, more justly, than this prerogative of the Crown, founded in mercy and immemorially exercised, was part of the common law (k); and that though the King could not by his prerogative vary the execution so as to aggravate the punishment beyond the intention of the law, yet he might mitigate the pain of infamy: and accordingly that an officer, acting upon a warrant from the Crown for beheading a person under sentence of death for felony, would not be guilty of any offence (l). But the rule may apply to an officer varying from the judgment of his own head, and without warrant or the colour of authority (m). And if an officer, whose duty it is to execute a sentence of whipping, should exceed all bounds of moderation, and thereby cause the party's death, it is said that he will at least be guilty of manslaughter (n).

Discipline at Sea.—Persons on board ship are necessarily subjected to something like a despotic government, and it is extremely important that the law should regulate the conduct of those who exercise dominion over them (o). In vessels belonging to the Royal Navy the correction of seamen is regulated by the Naval Discipline Act (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109) and the King's Regulations and Admiralty Instructions (p). The discipline of British merchant ships is governed by sects. 220–228 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60). In a case of manslaughter against the captain and mate of the vessel, by accelerating the death of a seaman really in ill health, but whom, they allege, they believe to be a skulker, that is, a person endeavouring to avoid his duty, the question is (in determining whether it is a slight or aggravated case), whether the phenomena of the disease were such as would excite the attention of humane and reasonable men; and, in such a case, if the deceased is taken on board after discharge from a hospital it is important to inquire whether he was sent on board by the surgeon of the hospital as a person in a fit state of health to perform the duties of a seaman (q).

Domestic and Scholastic Correction.—Parents, masters, and other persons having authority in foro domestico, may inflict reasonable chastisement on those under their care, such as children, pupils, or apprentices, and if death ensues without their fault, it will not be felony (r). In the case of a schoolmaster the right is said to exist by delegation from the parent or guardian of the child: and the delegation is not limited to acts of the child within four walls of the school, even in a day school (s). But if the correction exceeds the bounds of due moderation, either in the measure of it, or in the instrument used, the death ensuing will be either murder or manslaughter, according to the circumstances of the case. Where the fact is done with a dangerous weapon, improper for correction, and likely

(the age and strength of the party being duly considered) to kill or maim ; such as an iron bar, a sword, a pestle, or great staff ; or where the party is kicked to the ground, his belly stamped upon, and so killed, it will be murder (t). Thus, where a master had employed his apprentice to do some work in his absence, and on his return found it had been neglected, and thereupon threatened to send the apprentice to Bridewell, to which the apprentice replied, 'I may as well work there, as with such a master' ; upon which the master struck the apprentice on the head with a bar of iron which he had in his hand, and the apprentice died of the blow ; it was held murder : for if a father, master, schoolmaster, correct his child, servant, or scholar, it must be with such things as are fit for correction, and not with such instruments as will probably kill them ; otherwise, under pretence of correction, a parent may kill his child ; and a bar of iron is no instrument of correction (u).

The prisoner having employed her stepdaughter, a child of ten, to reel some yarn, and finding some of the skeins knotted, threw at the child a four-legged stool which struck her on the right temple, and caused her death. The stool was of sufficient size and weight to give a mortal blow : but the prisoner did not intend when she threw it to kill the child. These facts were stated in a special verdict, but the matter was considered of great difficulty, and no opinion was ever delivered by the judges (v).

In R. v. Wiggs (w), a shepherd boy had suffered some of the sheep, which he was employed in tending, to escape from their pen. The boy's master, the prisoner, seeing the sheep get out, ran towards the boy, and taking up a stake that was lying on the ground, threw it at him. The stake hit the boy on the head, and fractured his skull, of which fracture he soon afterwards died. Nares, J., after stating that every master had a right moderately to chastise his servant (x), but that the chastisement must be on just grounds, and with an instrument properly adapted to the purposes of correction, desired the jury to consider, whether the stake, which, lying on the ground, was the first thing the prisoner saw, in the heat of his passion, was, or was not, under such circumstances, and in such a situation, an improper instrument. For that the using a weapon from which death is likely to ensue, imports a mischievous disposition ; and the law implies that a degree of malice attended the act, which, if death actually happen, will be murder. Therefore, if the jury should think the stake was an improper instrument, they would further consider whether it was probable that it was used with an intent to kill ; that (x) In Combe's case, 9 Co. Rep. 76 a, it is said to have been held in 33 Edw. III. Trespass 253, that 'the lord may beat his villein for cause or without cause and the villein shall not have any remedy.' In R. v. Mawgridge, (12 St. Tr. 57 ; Kel. (J.) 133) it was held that 'If a parent or a master be provoked to a degree of passion by some miscarriage of the child or servant, and the parent or master shall proceed to correct the child or servant with a moderate weapon, and shall by chance give him an unlucky stroke, so as to kill him, that is but a misadventure. But if a parent or master shall use an improper instrument in the correction, then if he kills the child or servant it is murder.'

if they thought it was, they must find the prisoner guilty of murder ; but if they were persuaded it was not done with an intent to kill, the crime would then at most amount to manslaughter. The jury found it manslaughter. In this case it is presumed that the learned judge must be understood as meaning, that if the jury should think the instrument so improper as to be dangerous, and likely to kill or maim, the age and strength of the party killed being duly considered, the crime would amount to murder ; as the law would in such case supply the malicious intent ; but that if they thought that the instrument, though improper for the purpose of correction, was not likely to kill or maim, the crime would only be manslaughter, unless they should also think that there was an intent to kill (y).

Though the correction exceeds the bounds of moderation, the Court will pay regard to the nature of the provocation, where the act is manifestly accompanied with a good intent, and the instrument not such as must, in all probability, occasion death, though the party were hurried to great excess. A father, whose son had frequently been guilty of stealing, and who, upon complaints made to him of such thefts, had often corrected the son for them ; at length, upon the son being charged with another theft, and resolutely denying it, though proved against him, beat him in a passion with a rope, by way of chastisement for the offence, so much that he died. The father expressed the utmost horror, and was in the greatest affliction for what he had done, intending only to have punished him with such severity as to have cured him of his wickedness. The judge, by whom the father was tried, consulted his colleague in office, and the principal counsel on the circuit, who all concurred in opinion that it was only manslaughter ; and so it was ruled (z).

The deceased, a girl about fifteen, with her younger sister, had been placed, after their mother's death, under the care of an aunt, who employed them in stay-stitching fourteen or fifteen hours a day, and, when they did not do the required quantity of work, severely punished them with the cane and the rod. The deceased was in consumption, and did not do so much work as her sister, and, in consequence, was much oftener and more cruelly punished by the aunt, who accompanied her corrections with very violent and threatening language, and said that she was sure that the girl was acting the hypocrite and shamming illness, and that she had a very strong constitution. The surgeon said she died from consumption, but that her death was hastened by the treatment she had received. Under these circumstances, the counsel for the prosecution thought there was not proof of malice sufficient to constitute the crime of murder, as the aunt always alleged that she believed the girl was shamming illness, and was really able to do the work required, and which it appeared her younger sister actually did, and the Court concurred in that opinion (a).

On an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that the prisoner, a schoolmaster, having the care of the deceased, a boy of thirteen or fourteen, wrote to his father, stating that the boy was obstinate, and that, were he his own child, he should, after warning him, as he had done, subdue his obstinacy, by chastising him severely, and, if necessary, he should do it again and again, and continue it again even if he held out for hours. The father replied, 'I do not wish to interfere with your plan.' The prisoner took the boy into a room downstairs, and beat him for about two hours, between ten and twelve, with a thick stick; using also a skipping-rope. About midnight the prisoner beat him again, until about half-past twelve, when the beating and crying suddenly stopped. About seven the next morning, the prisoner said he had found the boy dead, and almost stiffening. A medical examination shewed that the thighs and other parts of the body were covered with bruises, and that there had been profuse bleeding and extravasation of blood caused by excessive and protracted beating, and that the immediate cause of death was exhaustion arising therefrom. The medical witnesses stated that upon the evidence, coupled with the prisoner's statement, the boy at seven o'clock in the morning must have been dead about six hours; so that their evidence went to shew that he died about the time when the beating was heard suddenly to cease. The prisoner had not avowed the beating until its effects had been discovered by a post-mortem examination, and had sent the body home so closely wrapped up that the bruises were not detected until the coverings were removed in consequence of rumours prevailing. There was no post-mortem examination prior to the inquest, at which the surgeon, who was called in by the prisoner at seven o'clock and who had only seen the boy's face, was examined, and the prisoner, who suggested that the boy had died of disease of the heart. The stick was at one end an inch thick; at the other it was edged with brass about the circumference of a sixpence, and there were holes in the shins of the deceased corresponding therewith, and which the medical witness thought must have been produced by poking therewith. The prisoner and his wife had been for some time going up and down stairs engaged in washing out the stains of blood in the night. Cockburn, C.J., said: 'By the law of England, a parent or a schoolmaster, who for this purpose represents the parent, and has the parental authority delegated to him, may, for the purpose of correcting what is evil in the child, inflict moderate and reasonable corporal punishment, always, however, with this condition, that it is moderate and reasonable. If it be administered for the gratification of passion or of rage, or if it be immoderate and excessive in its nature and degree, or if it be protracted beyond the child's powers of endurance, or with an instrument unfitted for the purpose and calculated to produce danger to life or limb; in all such cases the punishment is excessive, the violence is unlawful, and if death ensues it will be manslaughter' [at least]; and (after commenting on the evidence) 'It is true that the father authorised the chastisement, but he did not, and no law could, authorise an excessive chastisement. There can be no doubt that the prisoner thought the boy obstinate, but that did not excuse extreme severity and excessive punishment' (b).

(b) R. v. Hopley, 2 F. & F. 202. 'The indictment was for manslaughter: it certainly ought to have been for murder.'

In R. v. Griffin (c), where the father of a child two and a half years old had beaten it with a strap, Martin, B., after consulting Willes, J., said: 'The law as to correction has reference only to a child capable of appreciating correction, and not to an infant two years and a half old. Although a slight slap may be lawfully given to an infant by her mother, more violent treatment of an infant so young by her father would not be justifiable; and the only question for the jury to decide is whether the child's death was accelerated or caused by the blows inflicted by the prisoner.'

Careless Performance of Ordinary Duties.—If persons, in pursuit of their lawful and common occupations, see danger probably arising to others from their acts, and yet persist, without giving sufficient warning of the danger, and cause death, such killing seems in law to be murder. Thus, if workmen throwing stones, rubbish, or other things from a house, in the ordinary course of their business, happen to kill a person underneath, the question will be, whether they deliberately saw the danger, or betrayed any consciousness of it. If they did, and yet gave no warning, the act will amount to murder from its gross impropriety (d). So, if a person driving a cart or other carriage happens to kill another, and it appears that he saw, or had timely notice of the mischief likely to ensue, and yet drove on, it will be murder (e). Such acts are deliberate, and manifest a heartless disregard of social duty (f).

Where persons employed about a lawful occupation, from which danger may probably arise to others, neglect the ordinary precautions, it will be manslaughter, at least, on account of such negligence (g). Thus, if workmen throw stones, rubbish, or other things from a house, in the ordinary course of their business, by which a person underneath happens to be killed, if they did not look out and give timely warning to such as might be below, and there was even a small probability of persons passing by, it will be manslaughter (h). It was a lawful act, but done in an improper manner. It has, indeed, been said, that if this be done in the streets of London, or other populous towns, it will be manslaughter, notwithstanding such caution used (i). But this must be understood with some limitation. If it is done early in the morning, when few or no people are stirring, and ordinary caution is used, the party may be excusable; but when the streets are full, such ordinary caution will not suffice; for, in the hurry and noise of a crowded street, few people hear the warning, or sufficiently attend to it (j).

On an indictment for the manslaughter of a lunatic, it appeared that the prisoner, who was an attendant at a lunatic asylum, turned on the hot-water tap by mistake into a bath in which accidentally a lunatic had remained after having been told by the prisoner to get out. The prisoner thought the man had got out of the bath, and his attention being called away for the moment, he did not observe that the man was still there. Lush, J., directed the jury that if they took this view of the case it was an accident (k).

Persons using Dangerous Articles or Instruments.—As the degree of caution to be employed depends upon the probability of danger, it follows that persons using articles or instruments, in their nature peculiarly dangerous, must use such caution as the particular circumstances may require. Thus, though where one lays poison to kill rats, and another takes it and dies, this is misadventure: yet it must be understood to have been laid in such manner and place as not easily to be mistaken for proper food; for to lay it where it might be mistaken for food would be grossly negligent, and might in some cases amount to manslaughter (l).

A., having deer frequenting his cornfield, which was not within the precincts of any forest or chase, set himself in the night-time to watch in a hedge, and set B., his servant, to watch in another corner of the field, with a gun charged with bullets, giving him orders to shoot, when he heard any bustle in the corn by the deer. The master afterwards improvidently rushed into the corn himself, and the servant, supposing it to be the deer, shot and killed the master. Hale, C.J., ruled this to be misadventure, on the ground that the servant was misguided by his master's own direction, and was ignorant that it was anything else but the deer. He thought, however, that if the master had not given such direction, which was the occasion of the mistake, it would have been manslaughter, because of the want of due caution in the servant to shoot before he discovered his mark (m). But it is suggested by East that if, from all other circumstances of the case, there appeared a want of due caution in the servant, it does not seem that the command of the master could supply it, much less could excuse him in doing an unlawful act: and that the excuse of having used ordinary caution can only be admitted where death happens accidentally in the prosecution of some lawful act (n). On the same principle as to due caution it was ruled to be misadventure, where a commander coming upon a sentinel in the night, in the posture of an enemy, to try his vigilance, is killed by him as such; the sentinel not being able to distinguish his commander, under such circumstances, from an enemy (o).

The caution which the law requires, is not the utmost caution that can be used: reasonable caution is sufficient, such as is usual and ordinary in similar cases; such as has been found, by long experience in the ordinary human being resulted from infraction of these Acts it would seem to be manslaughter.

course of things to answer in the end (p). But in order to create criminal liability for homicide it is necessary to prove a grosser neglect of proper caution than would suffice to create a civil liability (q).

PART II.—CONCEALMENT OF BIRTH.

By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 60, 'If any woman shall be delivered of a child, every person who shall, by any secret disposition of the dead body of the said child, whether such child died before, at, or after its birth, endeavour to conceal the birth thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour: Provided that if any person tried (r) for the murder of any child shall be acquitted thereof, it shall be lawful for the jury, by whose verdict such person shall be acquitted, to find, in case it shall so appear in evidence, that the child had recently been born, and that such person did, by some secret disposition of the dead body of such child, endeavour to conceal the birth thereof, and thereupon the Court may pass such sentence as if such person had been convicted upon an indictment for the concealment of the birth' (s).

Under the former enactments (t) the mother only could be tried for the offence, and cases sometimes occurred where endeavours had been made to conceal the birth of children, and there was no evidence to prove that the mother participated in those endeavours, though there was sufficient evidence that others did so, and under such circumstances, all must have been acquitted (u). The above section is so framed as to include every person who uses any such endeavour; and it is quite immaterial under it whether there be any evidence against the mother or not.

(t) 43 Geo. III. c. 58, which repealed 21 Jac. I. c. 27, provided that trials, in England and Ireland, of women charged with the murder of any issue of their bodies, which would by law be bastard, should proceed by the like rules of evidence and presumption as were allowed to take place in respect to other trials for murder; and that the jury, by whose verdict any prisoner charged with such murder aforesaid should be acquitted, might find, 'that the prisoner was delivered of issue of her body, male or female, which, if born alive, would have been bastard; and that she did, by secret burying, or otherwise, endeavour to conceal the death thereof.' This provision could only be acted upon where the child was a bastard and where the party was charged with murder by an inquisition or an indictment. It was repealed by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31. In Scotland the enactment 49 Geo. III. c. 14 differs from 43 Geo. III. c. 58, and does not make that concealment a matter which can only be found by the jury upon the trial of an indictment for murder, but enacts (s. 2) 'that if any woman in Scotland shall conceal her being with child during the whole period of her pregnancy, and shall not call for and make use of help or assistance in the birth, and if the child be found dead or be missing, the mother, being lawfully convicted thereof, shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding two years, in such common gaol or prison as the Court before which she is tried shall direct and appoint.'

A person assisting the mother in concealing a birth will come within the terms of this section as a principal (vide ante, Book I. Chapter V.).

Secret Disposition.—Whether there is any evidence of a secret disposition within the statute is a question which depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. The most public exposure may be a secret disposition, as, for instance, in the middle of Dartmoor, or on the top of a mountain in Scotland in winter. It is for the jury to consider (v). The prisoner put the dead body of her child over a wall which was four and a half feet high, and divided a yard from a field. The yard was at the back of a public-house, and entered from the street by a narrow passage. The prisoner did not live at the public-house, and must have carried the body from the street up the passage to the yard. The field was grazed by the cattle of a butcher, and the only entrance to it was through a gate leading from the butcher's own yard. There was no path through the field, and a person in the field could only see the body in case he went up to the wall, close against which the body lay. A little girl, picking flowers in the field found the body of the child, twenty yards from the gate. There was nothing on or over the body to conceal it. Upon a case reserved it was held that there was evidence to go to the jury of a secret disposition of the dead body of the child, and a conviction for endeavouring to conceal the birth of the child, by secretly disposing of its dead body, was confirmed (w).

But where the dead body of a child was put into a box, and this box was put into a larger box, neither being locked or fastened, but both being closed, and the boxes were left in a bedroom, but in such a position as to attract the attention of those who daily resorted to the room, the jury were directed that this was not a secret disposition of the body (x).

Where on an indictment for endeavouring to conceal the birth of her child, it was proved that, the prisoner appearing ill, her mistress sent for a doctor, who asked the prisoner if she had been confined, and she said she had been; and the doctor asked her what she had done with the child, and she said it was in a box in her bedroom, and he went to the room and found the child in an open box, having the cover lifted; Byles, J., told the jury that 'there must be a secret disposition for the purpose of concealing the birth. The concealment must be by a secret disposition of the body, and a disposition could only be secret by placing it where it was not likely to be found. Secrecy was the essence of the offence. Could they say that an open box in the prisoner's bedroom was a secret disposition? It was for them to say, but in his opinion it was not' (z).

But where the body is placed in an unlocked box, all the attendant circumstances must be taken into consideration to determine whether or not an offence has been committed (a). Where the body was taken out of the house, and was placed in a locked pound which was open to the sky and surrounded by a wall five feet high along which there was a public footway, it was held that there was no secret disposition of the body (b). Where the prisoner put the dead body of her child on the bed and covered it with a petticoat, Jelf, J., held that there was no secret disposition and directed an acquittal (c).

Under 21 Jac. I. c. 27 (rep.), evidence was always allowed of the mother's having made provision for the birth, as a circumstance to shew that she did not intend to conceal the death (d). So, under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 14 (rep.), where the body of a child was found among the feathers of a bed, but it did not appear by whom it had been placed there, and the prisoner had prepared clothes for the child, and sent for a surgeon at the time of her confinement, an acquittal was directed (e). But the fact that the prisoner may have previously allowed the birth to be known to some persons is not conclusive evidence negating concealment (f).

The prisoner and one T. were indicted under 43 Geo. III. c. 58 (rep.) for the murder of the prisoner's bastard child; it was a seven months' child, and from the state in which it was found the probability was that it was stillborn. T., when questioned immediately after the child's birth, wholly denied it, though she must have known it. The prisoner threw the child down the privy; and the jury found this an endeavour to conceal the birth. On a case reserved, it was held that this was evidence of an endeavour to conceal the birth (g).

The sending for a female to attend at the beginning of the labour, and the fact of its being known to the mother of the woman and others that she was pregnant, were no bar to a conviction for concealing the birth, under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 14 (rep.), but only evidence for the consideration of the jury. If the dead body of the child were buried, or otherwise disposed of by an accomplice of the mother in her absence, the accomplice acting as her agent in so doing, she might be convicted under the last-mentioned Act of endeavouring to conceal the birth (h).

In order to bring a case within 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 14, the disposition of the body of the child must have been complete. The prisoner was found going across a yard in the direction towards a privy with a bundle of cloth sewed up, with the body of a child in it, and was stopped; Gurney, B., interposed and said, that the prisoner could not be convicted under that Act, the offence not being complete; 'the body must be buried or otherwise disposed of, to bring the case within the Act. Here she was interrupted in the act, probably, of disposing of the body, but the act was incomplete' (i). So where it appeared that the alleged concealment was the taking of the body immediately after the birth to a sister, living at a distance, for the purpose of having it buried in a churchyard, Erle, J., considered this did not amount to a concealment (j). But it was afterwards held that any concealment of

Where the naked dead body of a child was exposed in a public street where many persons were certain to pass and repass, and the exposure was calculated to outrage public decency, Denman, J., held that this was a nuisance at common law, but that there was no secret disposition of the dead body within this section. *R. v. the body, whether intended to be final or temporary, was within that Act (k).

Where on an indictment under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 14, for endeavouring to conceal the birth of a child, it appeared that the prisoner was delivered in a privy; that the child dropped from her there into the soil, and that there she left it, and the jury thought that she went into the privy for the purpose of being delivered there, and for the purpose thereby of concealing the birth; upon a case reserved, the judges thought, upon the wording of the section, it was necessary something should be done by the prisoner after the birth to bring the case within that section (l). So in a similar case, where the prisoner had denied her pregnancy and the birth, and the body of the child was found in a privy; Patteson, J., told the jury that the offence was not merely the endeavouring to conceal the birth of a child, but that the prisoner, to come within 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 14, must have endeavoured to conceal the birth by secret burying, or otherwise disposing of the dead body of the child; and it was essential to the commission of this offence that she should have done some act of disposal of the body after the child was dead. If she had gone into the privy for another purpose, and the child came from her unawares, and fell into the soil and was suffocated, she must be acquitted, notwithstanding her denial of the birth of the child, because she did not come within the provisions of the Act, unless she had done something with the child after it was dead. If there had been evidence that the child was born elsewhere, and was, after it was dead, carried by her to this place, and thrown in, that would be a disposing of the body within the Act (m). It is a question for the jury in such a case whether the prisoner threw the dead body into the privy, or whether it fell from her into it (n).

A woman delivered of a child born alive endeavoured to conceal the birth thereof by depositing the child while alive in the corner of a field, leaving the infant to die from exposure, which it did, and the dead body was afterwards found in the corner. Upon a case reserved it was held that she could not be convicted of concealing the birth of the child (o).

On an indictment for murder it appeared that the child was discovered in an outhouse, alive, but concealed from view by four bundles of rick-peggs lying horizontally in front and partly over it, but not touching it : the child was left as it was found, and about an hour afterwards the rick-peggs were found to have been partially removed, and placed on one side of the child, which was dead, and there was evidence to shew that the prisoner alone had been in the outhouse during the hour. For the prosecution it was urged that if the prisoner after the death of the child re-covered it, that would be a secret disposal of the body. Lord Campbell, C.J. : ' I have carefully examined the statute (9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 7) and the facts with reference to the point suggested by the counsel for the prosecution. Any objection that might have arisen, that there was no attempt to conceal the dead body of the child, is, I think, removed in the manner suggested ; for there cannot be any reasonable doubt that the prisoner visited the outhouse after the child was dead, and although she did not remove it, any replacing of the clothes or other things by which the body was concealed from view, would, I think, be an endeavour to conceal by a secret disposal of the dead body within the statute ' (p).

But where the dead body was found on the floor of an attic, wrapped in bed-sheets which had been removed from the room below ; the head of the child separated from the body, and a knife lying near it, and the body was in the middle of the room, Talfourd, J., held that there was no evidence of an endeavour to conceal (q).

Where on an indictment for murder, it appeared that the prisoner had denied that she was in the family way ; but in consequence of a stain of blood having been discovered in her bedroom she was questioned, and then said that she had taken the child away, and put it in a sheet of water in a park and she accompanied the constable thither, and pointed out where she had thrown in the body, and it was found wrapped in a towel and dressed in a cap and shirt ; and she afterwards stated that she had put away the body in a box in her room for two days, after which she threw it into the water, and she said she should have had it buried in the churchyard only she was afraid of provoking her father : Coltman, J., told the jury that the offence contemplated by the Act (9 Geo. IV. c. 31, rep.) was the endeavour to conceal the birth from the world at large, and not from any individual. The statute did not apply to individuals, but to society in general. If, therefore, the secret disposal of the dead body arose from an endeavour to conceal the birth from some private individual, and not from the world at large, then the offence contemplated by the statute had not been committed ; and if the jury believed that the prisoner was really actuated by the dread of provoking her father's displeasure, she was not guilty of this offence (r).

Where on an indictment under the Act (9 Geo. IV. c. 31, rep.) for concealing the birth, a surgeon stated that the remains were those of a child of which the mother must have gone from seven to nine months ; Erle, J., told the jury that, ' this offence cannot be committed unless the child had arrived at that stage of maturity at the time of birth that it might have been a living child. It is not necessary that it should have been born alive, but it must have reached a period when, but for some accidental circumstances, such as disease on the part of itself, or of its mother, it might have been born alive. There is no law which compels a woman to proclaim her own want of chastity; and if she had miscarried at a time when the foetus was but a few months old, and therefore could have had no chance of life, you could not convict her upon this charge. No specific limit can be assigned to the period when the chance of life begins; but it may, perhaps, be safely assumed that, under seven months, the great probability is that the child would not be born alive' (s).

In a case under 21 Jac. I. c. 27 (rep.), it appeared from the view of the child and by apparent probabilities, that it had not arrived at its debitum partus tempus, as it wanted hair and nails, the case was considered as not being within that statute, on account of there being presumptive evidence that the child was born dead; but under such circumstances it was left to the jury upon the evidence, as at common law, to say whether the mother was guilty of the death (t).

The dead body of the child must be found and identified on an indictment for attempting to conceal the birth. A woman apparently pregnant took a room at an inn in Stafford. On August 28 she received a Rugby newspaper by post with the Rugby postmark on it. On the same day her appearance and the state of her room seemed to shew that she had been delivered of a child. She left the inn next day for Shrewsbury, carrying a parcel. In the afternoon of that day a dead body of a child was found at Stafford railway station, wrapped in a Rugby newspaper dated August 27. There is a railway from Stafford to Shrewsbury, but no evidence was given that the prisoner had been at Stafford station. It was held that this evidence was not sufficient to identify the body of the child found as the child of the prisoner (u).

An indictment for concealing the birth of a child must expressly allege the child to be dead, for it is only an offence to conceal the dead body (v).

An indictment under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 14 (rep.), stated that the prisoner endeavoured to conceal the birth of her child 'by secretly disposing of the dead body'; and it was objected that the mode of disposal ought to be stated to enable the Court to see whether it amounted to the complete disposition contemplated by the statute, one mode was specified in the Act, and any other ought to be stated; and Maule, J., expressing a strong opinion that the objection was good, counsel for the prosecution declined to press the case (w).

(w) R. v. Hounsell, 2 M. & Rob. 292. But as the present clause has the words 'any secret disposition,' it should seem that an indictment in this form would be good; for every secret disposition is included. See Holloway v. R., 17 Q.B. 317, where it was held that a count for aiding an escape was good, though it did not state the means used, because the words of 4 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 43 (rep.) were 'shall, by any means whatever, aid.'

An indictment under the above enactment, alleging that the prisoner did cast the dead body of her child into the waters and filth in a privy, and 'did thereby then and there unlawfully dispose of the dead body of the said child, and endeavour to conceal the birth thereof,' was held sufficient; for the word 'thereby' applied both to the disposal and to the endeavour; and the indictment need not allege that the child died before, at, or after its birth (x).

PART III.—OF MANSLAUGHTER.

SECT. I.—DEFINITION AND PUNISHMENT.

The felony of manslaughter consists of the killing of man by man without malice aforethought (y), but without legal justification or excuse (z), i.e., under circumstances rendering the killing unlawful or legally culpable. The death must ensue within a year and a day of the culpable act or issue assigned as its cause (a). It is not defined by any statute, and the nearest approach to a statutory definition is the declaration in sect. 6 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), that 'it shall be sufficient in any indictment for manslaughter to charge that the defendant did feloniously kill and slay the deceased' (b).

By sect. 5 of that Act, 'whosoever shall be convicted of manslaughter shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . (c) or to pay such fine as the Court shall award, in addition to or without any other such discretionary punishment as aforesaid' (c). Where the person convicted is under sixteen, he is dealt with under sects. 102, 104 of the Children Act, 1908 (d).

Accessories.—In order to make an abettor to manslaughter a principal in the felony, he must be present aiding and abetting the fact committed (e). It was formerly considered that there could not be any accessories before the fact in any case in manslaughter, because it was presumed to be altogether sudden, and without premeditation (f): and it was laid down, that if the indictment be for murder against A., and that B. and C. were counselling and abetting as accessories before only (and not as present aiding and abetting, for such are principals), if A. be found guilty only of manslaughter, and acquitted of murder, the accessories before will be thereby discharged (g). But the position ought to be limited to those cases where the killing is sudden and unpremeditated; for there are cases of manslaughter where there may be accessories (h). Thus a man may be such an accessory by purchasing poison for a pregnant woman to take in order to procure abortion, and which she takes and thereby causes her death (i). Where two men fought with fists and the one was killed, and before fighting, by agreement, they each deposited a pound with the defendant, upon the terms that after the fight he was to hand over the two pounds to the winner, the defendant, who was not present at the fight, and took no further part in the circumstances attending it than to hold the money and to hand it over afterwards to the survivor, was held not liable to be convicted of being accessory before the fact to the manslaughter (j). There may be accessories after the fact in manslaughter (k).

Provocation and Mutual Combat.—Whenever death ensues from the sudden transport of passion, or heat of blood upon a reasonable provocation, and without malice, the offence will be manslaughter (l). The person sheltering himself under this plea of provocation must make out the circumstances of alleviation to the satisfaction of the Court and jury, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him; as the presumption of law deems all homicide to be malicious, until the contrary is proved. The decisions as to the line to be drawn between murder and manslaughter in cases of killing in mutual combat have been already discussed ante, p. 710.

Resistance to Officers of Justice, &c.—It has been before mentioned as a general rule, that where persons who have authority to arrest or imprison, and use the proper means for that purpose, are resisted in so doing, and killed, it will be murder in all who take part in such resistance (m). This protection of the law extends only to persons who have proper authority and do use that authority in a proper manner (n); wherefore questions of nicety and difficulty have frequently arisen upon the points of authority, legality of process, notice, and regularity of proceeding. The consequence of defects in any of these particulars, is in general that the offence of killing the person resisted is extenuated to manslaughter (o).

SECT. II.—KILLING IN THE PROSECUTION OF SOME UNLAWFUL OR WANTON PURPOSE.

Where death is caused by an act unlawful in itself, done heedlessly or incautiously, but without deliberation or mischievous intention (p), the killing is manslaughter (q). Where a blow aimed at one person lights upon another and kills him, the inquiry will be whether, if the blow had killed the person against whom it was aimed, the offence would have been murder or manslaughter. For if a blow, intended against A., and lighting on B., arose from a sudden transport of passion, which, in case A. had died by it, would have reduced the offence to manslaughter, the fact will admit of the same alleviation, if it shall have caused the death of B. (r).

There are so many acts so heedless and incautious as necessarily to be deemed unlawful and wanton, though there may not be any express intent to do mischief: and the party committing them, and causing death by such conduct, will be guilty of manslaughter. As if a person, who is breaking an unruly horse, rides him amongst a crowd of people, and death ensues from the viciousness of the animal, and it appears clearly to have been done heedlessly and incautiously only, and not with an intent to do mischief, the crime will be manslaughter (s). And if a man knowing that people are passing along the streets, throws a stone or shoots an arrow over a house or wall, and a person be thereby killed, this will be manslaughter, though there was no intention to do hurt to anyone, because the act itself was unlawful (t). So where a gentleman came to town in a chaise, and, before he got out of it, fired his pistols in the street, which, by accident, killed a woman, it was ruled manslaughter; for the act was likely to breed danger, and was manifestly improper (u).

A party who causes the death of a child by giving it spirituous liquors, in a quantity quite unfit for its tender age, has been held guilty of manslaughter (v).

On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the deceased was in possession of the goods of one of the prisoners under a warrant from the sheriff, and the three prisoners plied him with drink, themselves drinking freely also, and when he was very drunk, put him into a cabriolet, and caused him to be driven about the streets, and about two hours after he was put in the cabriolet he was found dead. Parke, B., after directing the jury to dismiss from their consideration that part of the indictment which alleged that the prisoners knew that the quantity of liquor taken was likely to cause death, of which there did not appear to be any evidence, and which, if proved, would make the offence approach to murder, told the jury that if they were of opinion that the prisoners put the deceased in the cabriolet, then the questions would be: first, whether they or any of them were guilty of administering or procuring the deceased to take large quantities of liquor for an unlawful purpose; or, whether, when he had taken it, they put him into the cabriolet for an unlawful purpose. If they thought that the three prisoners, or one of them, made him excessively drunk, to enable the prisoner, whose goods were seized, to prevent the completion of the execution; or if they were satisfied that the object of the prisoners, or any of them, was otherwise unlawful, and that the death of the deceased was caused in carrying their unlawful object into effect, they must be found guilty. The simple fact of persons getting together to drink, or one pressing another to do so, was not an unlawful act ; or, if death ensued, an offence that could be construed into manslaughter. Upon the first question stated, it would be essential to make out that the prisoners administered the liquor with the intention of making the deceased drunk, and then getting him out of the house ; and if that were doubtful, still if, when he was drunk, they removed him into the cabriolet with the intention of preventing his returning, and death was the result of such removal, the act was unlawful, and the case would be a case of manslaughter. If, however, they all got drunk together, and afterwards he was put into the cabriolet with an intention that he should take a drive only, that was not an unlawful object, such as had been described, and the prisoners would be entitled to an acquittal. And to a question put by the jury, the learned baron answered, that if the prisoners, when the deceased was drunk, drove him about in the cab, in order to keep him out of possession, and by so doing accelerated his death, it would be manslaughter (w).

If death ensues from an act which is a mere trespass the offence will be only manslaughter, not murder. Where a carman was in the front part of a cart loading it with sacks of potatoes, and a boy pulled the trapstick out of the front of the cart, but not with intent to do the man any harm, as he had seen it done several times before by others ; and in consequence of the trapstick having been taken out, the cart tilted up, and the deceased was thrown out on his back on the stones, and the potatoes were shot out of the sacks, and fell on and covered him over, and he died in consequence of the injuries then received, it was held that the boy was guilty of manslaughter (x). Where an indictment for manslaughter alleged that the prisoners in and upon one L. H. did make an assault, and that L. H. then lying in a certain cart containing divers bags of nails of great weight, the prisoners did with their hands force up the shafts of the said cart, and throw down the body of the said cart in which L. H. was so as aforesaid lying, and him the said L. H. by such forcing up of the shafts and throwing down of the body of the said cart as aforesaid, did cast and throw upon the ground under the said bags of nails ; by means whereof the said bags of nails were thrown and forced against over and upon the breast of L. H., L. H. then being upon the ground, and the said bags of nails then and there did press and lie upon the breast of L. H., thereby giving, &c., Taunton, J., held that it was not necessary to allege in the indictment that the prisoners knew the deceased to be in the cart, as malice was not an ingredient in the crime (y).

On an indictment for manslaughter, the following statement of the prisoner was proved : ‘ As I was going home about four o’clock this afternoon I heard the report of a gun. Shortly afterwards I saw the deceased with a gun, and I went to him to take his gun from him. We had a scuffle together for about ten minutes, and there were blows exchanged on both sides ; the deceased struck me, and knocked me down with his gun ; at the same time the gun went off, and shot the deceased.

I was insensible for a short time, and when I came round found the deceased was dead, and had the barrel of the gun in his hand.' The prisoner was a gamekeeper of a gentleman who had permission by parol to shoot over the land where this scuffle took place. It was contended that, admitting that the prisoner had no right to take the gun away, and that he was guilty of an assault in attempting to do so, the death was not the result of that assault, but of the excess of violence of the deceased himself. Lord Campbell, C.J., told the jury that the case was one of manslaughter. The struggle between the prisoner and the deceased was to be considered as one continuous illegal act on the part of the prisoner, and death resulting from that act (2).

The defendant kept a gun loaded with printing types, in consequence of several robberies having been committed in the neighbourhood, and sent a mulatto girl, his servant, of the age of about thirteen, for the gun, desiring the person in whose house he lodged to take the priming out. This he did, and told the girl so, and delivered the gun to her, and she put it down in the kitchen, resting on the butt, and soon afterwards took it up again, and presented it, in play, at the plaintiff's son, a young boy, saying she would shoot him, and drew the trigger, and the gun went off, and wounded the boy. It was held that the defendant was liable to an action for the injury. Ellenborough, C.J., said: 'The defendant might and ought to have gone farther; it was incumbent on him, who, by charging the gun, had made it capable of doing mischief, to render it safe and innoxious. This might have been done by the discharge or drawing of the contents; and though it was the defendant's intention to prevent all mischief, and he expected that this would be effectuated by taking out the priming, the event has unfortunately proved that the order to Leman was not sufficient; consequently, as by this want of care the instrument was left in a state capable of doing mischief, the law will hold the

(2) R. v. Wesley, 1 F. & F. 528. 'Lord Campbell refused to reserve the point; and yet it seems well deserving of better consideration. If the prisoner had died from the excess of violence inflicted by the deceased, it cannot be doubted that the deceased would have been guilty of manslaughter, and it is not a little startling to hold that that excess of violence which caused the gun to explode is to make the prisoner guilty of manslaughter. Suppose the deceased had pulled the trigger intending to shoot the prisoner, and in the struggle he had shot himself instead, it would be startling to hold the prisoner guilty of manslaughter. The reason why an excess of violence is punished is, that it is not in point of law attributable to the assault committed, but to the wrongful act of the party assaulted, and to hold the party assaulting guilty of the result of an excess of violence is to hold him guilty of the consequence of an act, of which the law not only holds him not to be guilty, but holds the other party to be guilty, or, to put it in still simpler terms, to hold him responsible for an act which the law holds not to be his act at all, but to be wholly the act of another person.'—C. S. G. In R. v. Archer (1 F. & F. 351) the deceased had deposited a gun with A. to secure a loan of money, and in A.'s absence called at his house and took away the gun without repaying the money. A. went to the deceased and demanded the gun back, and on his refusal to give it up began to wrestle with him. The deceased said that the gun was loaded; the prisoner, however, persisted in his attempt to take it away, and after a violent struggle succeeded in doing so; but, falling on the ground as he was in the act of wrenching the gun away, the gun went off accidentally, and killed the deceased. Campbell, C.J., told the jury that, though the prisoner had a right to the possession of the gun, to take it away from the deceased by force was unlawful; and that as the discharge of the gun was this result of the unlawful act, it was their duty to find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter. The decision in Blades v. Higgs, 11 H. L. C. 621, 10 C. B. (N. S.) 713, seems to render this ruling of no authority.

defendant responsible' (a). It has been suggested in former editions that this ruling would have justified the conviction of the defendant for manslaughter if death had ensued : but it is very doubtful whether it can safely be pressed so far.

Where a person fires at another a firearm, knowing it to be loaded, and therefore intending either to kill or to do grievous bodily harm, if death ensues the crime is murder ; and if he does not know that it is loaded, and has taken no pains to ascertain, the crime is manslaughter (b).

A man found a pistol in the street, which he had reason to believe was not loaded, having tried it with the rammer : he carried it home, and shewed it to his wife ; and she standing before him, he pulled up the cock, and touched the trigger ; and the pistol went off and killed the woman. This was ruled manslaughter (c). But the legality of the decision has been doubted, on the ground that the man examined the pistol in the common way, and used the ordinary caution deemed to be effectual in similar cases (d). And Foster, J., after stating his reasons for disapproving of the judgment, says, that he had been the longer upon the case, because accidents of this lamentable kind may be the lot of the wisest and best of mankind, and most commonly fall amongst the nearest friends and relations ; and then proceeds to state a case of a similar kind, in which the trial was had before himself. On a Sunday morning a man and his wife went to take dinner at the house of a friend. He carried his gun with him, but before dinner he discharged it, and set it up in a private place in his friend's house. After dinner he went to church ; and in the evening, returned home with his wife, bringing his gun with him. He taking it up, touched the trigger ; and the gun went off and killed his wife. It came out in evidence, that, while the man was at church, another person took the gun, charged it, and went after some game ; and returned it, loaded, to the place whence he took it, and the defendant, who was ignorant of all that had passed, found it, to all appearance as he had left it. 'I did not inquire,' says Foster, J., 'whether the poor man had examined the gun before he had carried it home ; but being of opinion, upon the whole evidence, that he had reasonable grounds to believe that it was not loaded, I directed the jury that, if they were of the same opinion, they should acquit him : and he was acquitted' (e).

But, qu., whether the ordinary and proper precaution would not have been to have examined the pan, which in all probability must have been primed. The rammer of a pistol, or gun, is so frequently too short, from having been accidentally broken, that it would be very incautious in a person previously unacquainted with the state of the instrument to rely upon such proof as he could receive from the rammer, unless it were passed so smartly down the barrel as clearly to give the sound of the metal at the bottom. However, there is a qu. to the case in the margin of the report, and it appears that the learned Editor (Holt, C.J.) was not satisfied with the judgment ; and that it is one of the points which, in the Preface, he recommends for further consideration.

broke the scaffolding ; and that in consequence of the scaffolding being so broken, a corf, in which the deceased was descending the mine, struck against a beam, on which the scaffolding had been supported, and by such striking the corf was overturned, and the deceased precipitated into the mine and killed. It was proved that scaffolding was usually found in mines in the neighbourhood, for the purpose of supporting the corves, and enabling the workmen to get out and work the mines ; that the stones were of a size and weight sufficient to knock away the scaffolding, and that if the beam only was left, the probable consequence would be that the corf striking against it would upset, and occasion death or injury. Tindal, C.J., said : ‘ If death ensues as the consequence of a wrongful act, an act which the party who commits it can neither justify nor excuse, it is not accidental death but manslaughter. If the wrongful act was done under circumstances which shew an intent to kill, or do any serious injury in the particular case, or any general malice, the offence becomes that of murder. In the present instance, the act was one of mere wantonness and sport, but still the act was wrongful—it was a trespass. The only question therefore is, whether the death of the party is to be fairly and reasonably considered as a consequence of such wrongful act ; if it followed from such wrongful act, as an effect from a cause, the offence is manslaughter ; if it is altogether unconnected with it, it is accidental death ’ (ee).

But where a person wrongfully and wantonly threw a large box from a pier into the sea and accidentally struck and killed a man who was swimming under the pier, Field, J., after consulting Mathew, J., said that the question of negligence must be left to the jury and not the mere question whether the death was caused by the wrongful act of the prisoner. The mere fact that the prisoner had committed a civil wrong ought not to be used as an incident which was a necessary step in a criminal case (f).

Unlawful Games.—Where sports are unlawful in themselves, or productive of danger, riot, or disorder, so as to endanger the peace, and death ensue in the pursuit of them, the party killing is guilty of manslaughter (g). Prize-fighting, public boxing matches (h) or any other sports of a similar kind, which are exhibited for lucre, and tend to encourage idleness by drawing together a number of disorderly people, have been considered unlawful (i). For in these cases the intention of the parties is not innocent in itself, each being careless of what hurt may be given, provided that the promised reward or applause be obtained ; and meetings of this kind have also a strong tendency to cause a breach of the peace (j). Therefore, where the prisoner had killed his opponent in a boxing match, it was held that he was guilty of manslaughter ; though he had been challenged to fight by his adversary for a public trial of skill in boxing, and was also urged to engage by taunts ; and the occasion was sudden (k).

Prize-fights are altogether illegal; as illegal as duels with deadly weapons, and it is not material which party strikes the first blow (l).

In R. v. Coney (m), two men fought with each other in a ring formed by ropes supported by posts and in the presence of a large crowd. Amongst the crowd were the prisoners, who were not proved to have taken any active part in the management of the fight, or to have said or done anything. They were tried and convicted of aiding and abetting an assault. Upon a case reserved the conviction was quashed by eight judges against three, the majority holding that mere voluntary presence at a fight does not as a matter of law necessarily render persons so present guilty of aiding and abetting an assault, although the mere presence unexplained may, it would seem, afford some evidence for the consideration of a jury.

In R. v. Murphy (n), at a fight at which many were assembled the ring was several times broken by persons carrying sticks, which they used with great violence, and the deceased died of blows then received; Littledale, J., directed the jury: 'You ought to consider whether the deceased came by his death in consequence of blows he received in the fight itself; for if he came by his death by any means not connected with the fight itself, that is, if his death was caused by the mob coming in with bludgeons, and taking the matter as it were out of the hands of the combatants, then persons merely present encouraging the fight would not be answerable, unless they are connected in some way with that particular violence. If the death occurred from the fight itself, all persons encouraging it by their presence are guilty of manslaughter; but if the death ensued from violence unconnected with the fight itself, that is, by blows given not by the other combatant in the course of the fight, but by persons breaking in the ring and striking with their sticks, those who were merely present are not, by being present, guilty of manslaughter.'

Killing another by throwing stones at another wantonly in play, being a dangerous sport without the least appearance of any good intent, or doing any other such idle action as cannot but endanger the bodily hurt of some one or other, will be manslaughter (o).

Lawful Sports.—Such sports and exercises as tend to give strength, activity, and skill in the use of arms, and are entered into as private recreations amongst friends without any intention to cause bodily harm, such as playing at cudgels, or foils, or sparring with gloves (p), wrestling by consent, or football (q), are deemed lawful; and if either party happens accidentally to be killed in such sports, it is excusable homicide by misadventure (r).

Though it cannot be said that such sports are altogether free from danger, yet they are very rarely attended with fatal consequences, and each party has friendly warning to be on his guard. Proper caution and fair play should, however, be observed, and illegal violence avoided, and, though the weapons used be not of a deadly nature, yet, if they may breed danger, there should be due warning given, that each party may start upon equal terms. For if two are engaged to play at cudgels, and the one make a blow at the other, likely to hurt, before he is upon his guard, and without warning, from whence death ensues, the want of due and friendly caution will make such act amount to manslaughter, but not murder, the intent not being malicious (s).

In R. v. Young (t) seven men were indicted for manslaughter. They had been sparring with gloves on, and the deceased was with them. After several rounds the deceased fell and struck his head against a post, whilst he was sparring with the prisoner. The men were all friendly, but as the deceased and the prisoner came up to the last round they were 'all in a stumble together.' The medical testimony was to the effect that sparring might be dangerous, but that death would be unlikely to result from such blows as had been given. The danger would be where a person was able to strike a straight blow, but the danger would be lessened as the combatants got weakened. Bramwell, B., said, the difficulty was to see what there was unlawful in this matter. It took place in a private room; there was no breach of the peace. No doubt if death ensued from a fight, independently of its taking place for money, it would be manslaughter; because a fight was a dangerous thing and likely to kill; but the medical witness here had stated, that this sparring with the gloves was not dangerous, and not a likely thing to kill. After consulting Byles, J., Bramwell, B., said, that he retained the opinion he had previously expressed. It had, however, occurred to him that supposing there was no danger in the original encounter, the men fought on until they were in such a state of exhaustion that it was probable they would fall, and fall dangerously, and if death ensued from that, it might amount to manslaughter, and he proposed, therefore, so to leave the case to the jury and reserve the point if necessary. The prisoners were acquitted.

In R. v. Orton (u) it was held upon a case reserved that if persons meet to fight intending to continue till they give in from injury or exhaustion, the fight is unlawful whether gloves are or are not used.

On a trial for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner came into a shop and pulled a young lad by the hair off a cask where he was sitting, and put his arm round his neck and spun him round, and they came together out of the shop, and the prisoner kept spinning him round, and the lad broke away from him, and in consequence, and at the moment of his so doing, the prisoner, being intoxicated, reeled into the road, and against the deceased who was passing and knocked her down, and she died shortly afterwards. The lad said he did not resist the prisoner—he thought the prisoner was only playing with him, and was sure that it was intended as a joke throughout. Erle, J., told the jury: ‘Where the death of one person is caused by the act of another, while the latter is in pursuit of any unlawful object, the person so killing is guilty of manslaughter, although he had no intention whatever of injuring him who was the victim of his conduct. Here, however, there was nothing unlawful in what the prisoner did to this lad, and which led to the death of the woman. Had this treatment of the boy been against his will, the prisoner would have been committing an assault—an unlawful act—which would have rendered him amenable for any consequences resulting from it; but as everything that was done was with the boy’s consent, there was no assault, and consequently no illegality. It is in the eye of the law an accident, and nothing more’ (v).

Ordinarily the weapons made use of upon such occasions are not deadly in their nature. In some sports the instruments used are of a deadly nature; yet, if they are not directed by the persons using them against each other, and therefore no danger is reasonably to be apprehended, the killing which may casually ensue will be only homicide by misadventure. Such will be the case, therefore, where persons shoot at game, or butts, or any other lawful object, and a bystander is killed (w).

Even in lawful sports, if the weapons used are of an improper and deadly nature, the party killing will be guilty of manslaughter. Sir John Chichester in playing with his manservant made a pass at the servant with the sword in the scabbard, and the servant parried it with a bed-staff, but in so doing struck off the chape of the scabbard, whereby the end of the sword came out of the scabbard; and the thrust not being effectually broken, the servant was killed by the point of the sword (x). This was adjudged manslaughter: and Foster, J., thinks, in conformity with Lord Hale, that it was rightly so adjudged, on the ground that there was evidently a want of common caution in making use of a deadly weapon in so violent an exercise, where it was highly probable that the chape might be beaten off, which would necessarily expose the servant to great bodily harm (y).

The deceased met with his death in the course of a game of football played according to the Association rules. The deceased was kicking the ball when the prisoner in charging him struck him with his knee in the stomach, inflicting injuries which proved fatal. Bramwell, L.J., told the jury : ‘ If a man is playing according to the rules and practice of the game and not going beyond, it may be reasonable to infer that he is not actuated by any malicious motive or intention, and that he is not acting in a manner which he knows will be likely to be productive of death or injury. But if the prisoner intended to cause serious hurt to the deceased, or if he knew that in charging as he did he might produce serious injury, and was indifferent and reckless as to whether he did so or not, then the act would be unlawful ’ (z). The jury acquitted the prisoner.

Shooting at deer in another’s park, without leave, is an unlawful act, though done in sport, and without any felonious intent ; and therefore if a bystander is killed by the shot, such killing will be manslaughter (a).

In one case, where rioters, having forcibly gained possession of a house, afterwards killed a partisan of the person whom they had ejected, as he, in company with a number of others, was endeavouring in the night forcibly to regain the possession, and to fire the house, they were adjudged guilty only of manslaughter (b). The ratio decidendi seems to have been that the person slain was so much in fault himself (c). But the decision is an exception from the general rule already stated as to the liability of rioters in case of homicide (d).

SECT. III.—KILLING IN CONSEQUENCE OF SOME LAWFUL ACT BEING CRIMINALLY OR IMPROPERLY PERFORMED, OR OF SOME ACT PERFORMED WITHOUT LAWFUL AUTHORITY.

An act, not unlawful in itself, may be performed in a manner so criminal and improper, or by an authority so defective, as to make the party performing it, and in the prosecution of his purpose causing the death of another person, guilty of murder (e). And as the circumstances of the case may vary, the party so killing another may be guilty only of manslaughter (f).

(f) In R. v. Tranter (as reported 1 Str. 449), L., being arrested for a small debt, prevailed on one of the officers to go with him to his lodgings, while the other was sent to fetch the attorney’s bill, in order, as L. pretended, to have the debt and costs paid. Words arose at the lodgings about civility money, which L. refused to give, and he went upstairs, pretending to fetch money for the payment of the debt and costs, leaving the officer below. He soon returned with a brace of loaded pistols in his bosom, which, at the importunity of his servant, he laid down on the table, saying, ‘ he did not intend to hurt the officers, but he would not be ill-used.’ The officer who had been sent for the attorney’s bill soon returned to his companion at the lodgings; and, words of anger arising, L. struck one of the officers on the face with a walking cane, and drew a little blood. Whereupon both of them fell upon him; one stabbed him in nine places, he all the while on the ground begging for mercy, and unable to resist them; and one of them fired one of the pistols at him while on the ground, and gave him his death wound. This is said to have been held manslaughter, by reason of the first assault with the cane. This decision is criticised as extraordinary by Foster (293, 294), who mentions additional circumstances as reported 16 St. Tr. 1. 1. L. had a sword by his side, which, after the affray was over, was found drawn and broken. 2. When L. laid the pistols on the table, he declared that he brought them down because he would not be forced out of his lodgings. 3. He threatened the officers several times. 4. One of the officers appeared to have been wounded in the hand by a pistol shot (for both

Where an inquisition alleged that the defendants were trustees under an Act of Parliament, and that it was their duty to contract for the repair of a road, and also to repair the road, and that they did feloniously neglect to contract for the reparation of the said road, and did feloniously neglect to repair the same, and that W. B. being riding in a barrow along the said road, the defendants by their neglect to contract for the reparation of the said road, and by their neglect to repair the same, did cause one wheel of the said barrow to fall into a large hole in the said road, and the said W. B. to be thereby thrown with great violence from the said barrow upon the ground, whereby he was killed; it was held that the inquisition was bad: not only must the neglect, to make a party guilty of it liable to the charge of felony, be personal, but the death must be the immediate result of that personal neglect, and here the death was not the direct consequence of the neglect charged (g).

Negligence in Business.—Upon an indictment for the manslaughter of a child, it appeared that the child being ill, the mother sent to a chemist for a pennyworth of paregoric; the chemist's apprentice delivered a phial, with a paregoric label on it, but with laudanum in it; and the mother, supposing it to be paregoric, gave the child six or seven drops, which killed it. The laudanum bottle and the paregoric bottle stood side by side. Bayley, J., told the jury: 'If you think there was negligence on the part of the prisoner, you will find him guilty; if not, you must acquit him' (h).

The prisoner was indicted for manslaughter, in having, by negligence in the manner of slinging a cask, caused the same to fall and kill two females, who were passing along the causeway. It appeared that there were three modes of slinging casks customary in Liverpool: one by slings passed round each end of the cask; a second by can hooks; and a third which the prisoner employed, by a single rope round the centre of the cask. The cask was hoisted up to the fourth storey of a warehouse, and on being pulled endways towards the door, it slipped from the rope as soon as it touched the floor of the room. Parke, J., told the jury: 'The double slings are undoubtedly the safest mode; but, if you think that the mode which the prisoner adopted was reasonably sufficient, you cannot convict him' (i).

pistols were discharged in the affray), and slightly wounded on the wrist by some sharp-pointed weapon, and the other was slightly wounded in the hand by a like weapon. 5. The evidence touching L. begging for mercy was not that he was on the ground begging for mercy, but that on the ground he held up his hands as if he was begging for mercy. Upon these facts Pratt, C.J., directed the jury, that if they believed L. endeavoured to rescue himself, which he seemed to think was the case, and which very probably was the case, it would be justifiable homicide in the officers. And as L. gave the first blow, accompanied with menaces to the officers, and the circumstance of producing loaded pistols to prevent their taking him from his lodgings, which it would have been their duty to have done, if the debt had not been paid or bail given, he declared it would be no more than manslaughter.

The prisoner, who was an ironfounder, was employed to make twelve cannon. Four of them were sent home and tried, and one of them burst under the touch-hole, and was sent back to the prisoner, with orders to have it melted up. The prisoner returned it nailed down to a carriage, and there was some lead in it, which must have been put there to stop up the part which had burst, as it matched the former aperture. The cannon was loaded, with an ordinary charge, burst, and thereby killed the deceased. It was held that the prisoner was guilty of manslaughter (j).

The prisoner had a firework shop in the Westminster Road, where he had for some time carried on the business of selling fireworks. No fireworks were made there except as follows:—First, the finishing the smaller rockets, and making stars for them of combustible matter; secondly, making fireworks called serpents; thirdly, making cases and filling them with combustible matter, called red, blue, and green fires (k). The fire was employed for filling coloured cases used to imitate revolving lights in fireworks called wheels. These cases affixed were not used by themselves, but in connection with those fireworks, to add to their effect. The contents of the cases of fire made at the Westminster Road were combustible, and the red fire would explode if struck hard. Five or six pounds of fire were made every day in the house in Westminster Road, and filled there in the back room into cases with a rammer and mallet by persons employed for the purpose. At the time of the fire there was a quantity of the red and blue fire in the house, in the room where it was to be put into cases, in order to be used in the course of the business, and a quantity of fireworks for the evening. The prisoner being out of the house and not personally interfering, a fire broke out in the red and blue fire, which communicated to the fireworks which were kept in the shop, causing a rocket to cross the street and set fire to a house, in which the deceased was consequently burnt to death. It was contended that the fire was accidental in the sense of not being wilful or designed; that it did not happen through any personal interference or negligence of the prisoner; that he was entitled to the benefit of any distinction between its happening through negligence of his servants, or by pure accident without any such negligence; that the cases of red, &c., fire, were only parts of the fireworks, and not within 9 & 10 Will. III. c. 7; that it did not appear that it was by reason of making the fireworks that the mischief happened, and that the death was not the direct and immediate result of any wrong or omission on the prisoner's part. Willes, J., held that the prisoner was guilty of a misdemeanor in doing an act with intent to do what was forbidden by the statute, and that, as the fire was occasioned by such misdemeanor, and without it would not have taken place, or could not have been of such a character as to cause the death, a case was made out; but, upon a case reserved, the conviction was held wrong. Cockburn, C.J., said, 'The keeping of the fireworks in the shop by the prisoner caused the death only by the superaddition of the negligence of some one else. By the negligence of the prisoner's servants the fireworks ignited, and the house in which the deceased was, was set on fire and death ensued. The keeping of the fireworks may be a nuisance; and if, from the unlawful act of the prisoner, death had ensued as a necessary and immediate consequence, the conviction might be upheld. The keeping of the fireworks, however, did not alone cause the death: plus that act of the prisoner there was the negligence of the prisoner's servants' (l).

H. was commandant of the forces at the garrison of Plymouth. A target was placed in the Sound, under the general directions of the Horse Guards, and the artillerymen were accustomed to practise by firing at it with ball. One day while such practice was proceeding a ball missed the target, and, striking the waves, ricocheted and hit a boatman, who was taking a boat across the Sound in the lawful and proper exercise of his vocation, and in a place where he might lawfully be. Byles, J., after stating that the depositions were extremely long and vague, so that he hardly knew in what shape the charge would be presented, is said to have told the grand jury that 'manslaughter was when one man was killed by the culpable negligence of another' (n). A slight act of negligence was not sufficient—all men and women were negligent at some time; it would depend on the degree of negligence. A slight deviation from proper care and skill was not sufficient. By way of illustration: suppose a man were to fire a gun in a field where he saw no one, and as he fired another man suddenly raised his head from a ditch; he could not say that that man would be guilty of manslaughter; it would be held not to be culpable negligence (n). But supposing a man were to fire down the High Street of Exeter because he saw no one, and some one was suddenly to appear, and he was killed, that would be culpable negligence in the man who fired the gun. It would seem, and the results shewed it, that the

(l) R. v. Bennett, Bell, 1: 28 L. J. M. C. 27. 'The case stated that the question of a nuisance, independent of the statute, was disposed of upon the facts in favour of the prisoner. Not a single authority or case was referred to in the argument, or by the Court: and this case seems deserving of reconsideration. The death would not have happened except for the unlawful act of the prisoner; for, unless the combustibles had been where they were, the death would not have occurred. If they had spontaneously ignited, or a stranger had accidentally ignited them by striking his nailed boots on the floor, it cannot be doubted that the prisoner would have been guilty of manslaughter; but it is said that the negligence of the servant exonerates the master. It is submitted that, in point of law, it has no such effect. A master may be criminally responsible for the wilful acts of his servants, where they are done in the course of their employment and for his profit. R. v. Dixon, 3 M. & S. 11; and a fortiori, he ought to be held to be criminally responsible for the negligence of his servants in his employment, where that employment is a dangerous one, and carried on unlawfully in a place where it is perilous to the public. "The law takes notice that occasional carelessness may be reckoned upon, and forbids that to be done which, on the recurrence of carelessness, will, in all probability, prove destructive to life," R. v. Lister, Dears. & B. 209: and therefore a person, who carries on such an employment in such a place, must be taken to contemplate the carelessness of his servants as one of the natural consequences of his carrying it on, and ought to be held criminally responsible for it. See the principles laid down in R. v. Lister.' C. S. G. 9 & 10 Will. III. c. 7 was repealed in 1860 by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 139, and the latter Act was repealed by the Explosives Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 17), under which the manufacture and storage of gunpowder and other explosives is now regulated.

(m) This is only one form of manslaughter; vide ante, p. 780.

(n) 'It is clear this would be no negligence at all. The case as put is of a man lawfully shooting in a lawful place, where he had no reason to suppose any other person was.' C. S. G.

boat was within the range of fire ; but that was no defence. If the man had not been killed, and had brought an action for damages, or if his wife or family had brought an action, or if he had in any degree contributed to the result an action could not be maintained. But in a criminal case it was different. The Queen was the prosecutor, and could be guilty of no negligence ; and if both the parties were negligent, the survivor was guilty ; and therefore it was no defence that the boat was in danger (o). He could only speculate upon the negligence imputed in this case. First he did not know that it would be said that it was an improper place whether to fire from or to fire over. The gun was fired from one of the batteries kept on purpose for practice. It was said that this battery was too low ; but that was not the point of defence. Therefore, subject to their better judgment, nothing could be imputed to the defendant as to the place whence the gun was fired. Then as to the place over which it was fired. Had the defendant the selection of it ? Then in using the place, although an improper one, was he obeying military orders ? If so, he would not be guilty (p). Common danger did not make the place improper. He was a man performing a most important duty. Supposing, therefore, that the defendant had been personally engaged in the firing : if he thought that the place from which the gun was fired was not improper, and that the place to which the firing was directed was not improper, assisted by additional precautions, which might be used, he would not be responsible, because acting under the direction of superior authority. It seemed that complaints had been made by a great many persons residing in Plymouth and Devonport, and he must beg their attention to the orders the defendant had given. The major-general would impress upon the officers in command to see with the utmost diligence that the range was free before the firing. Then there was a second order. The major-general impresses upon the officers the necessity of seeing that all was free, as he should hold them personally responsible. He had hitherto presumed that the defendant had personally to do with the firing ; and, if he had, he would not be guilty of manslaughter. But the next question was, did he personally superintend the firing or did he not ? They would see whether he did or not. Was he guilty of a breach of duty in not personally superintending the firing ? He could not see that he was. Again, it might be said, that if he issued orders it was his duty to see that proper persons were appointed to keep a proper look-out ; and if proper persons were nominated by him, it did not appear whether they were properly disciplined, and it might be a question whether there was any negligence in them. There were persons with flags, but whether a proper look-out was kept might possibly be doubtful ; whether means were taken for keeping a proper look-out they would have to determine. Under these circumstances it would be for them to say whether negligence was brought home to the defendant (g).

(p) 'With all deference, this seems to be an error. The commission of a felony can never be excused by the order of any superior, except in cases where the circumstances are such as to warrant the act that is done, as in case of rebellion, &c. In other cases the law acknowledges no distinction between the soldier and the private individual. See the charge of Tindal, C.J., ante, p. 432. And the command of the master is no defence to the servant. See R. v. James, 8 C. & P. 131. If the military authorities gave an order to practise at a particular place, that order would only justify practising in a careful and proper manner.' C. S. G.

A., B., and C. went into a field in proximity to certain roads and houses, taking with them a rifle which would be deadly at a mile, for the purpose of practising firing with it. B. placed a board, which was handed to him by A., in the presence of C., in a tree in the field as a target. All three fired shots directed at the board so placed, from a distance of about 100 yards. No precautions of any kind were taken to prevent danger from such firing. One of the shots thus fired by one, though it was not proved by which one of them, killed a boy in a tree in a garden near the field at a spot distant 393 yards from the firing point. A., B., and C. were all found guilty by a jury of manslaughter. On a case reserved it was held that all three had been guilty of a breach of duty in firing at the spot in question without taking proper precautions to prevent injury to others, and were rightly convicted of manslaughter (r).

Vehicles.—It is the duty of every man who drives a vehicle on a public highway to drive it with such care and caution as to prevent, as far as is in his power, any injury to any person (s).

A foot passenger, though he may be infirm from disease, has a right to walk on the carriage-way, although there be a footpath, and he is entitled to the exercise of reasonable care on the part of persons driving carriages along the carriage-way (t).

On an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that the deceased was walking along a road, in a state of intoxication: the prisoner was driving a cart drawn by two horses, without reins; the horses were cantering, and the prisoner was sitting in front of the cart; on seeing the deceased, he called to him twice to get out of the way, but from the state he was in, and the rapid pace of the horses, he could not do so, and one of the cart wheels passed over him, and he was killed; it was held, that if a man drive a cart at an unusually rapid pace, whereby a person is killed, though he calls repeatedly to such person to get out of the way, if, from the rapidity of the driving, or from any other cause, the person cannot get out of the way in time enough, but is killed, the driver is in law guilty of manslaughter; and that it is the duty of every man, who drives any carriage, to drive it with such care and caution as to prevent, as far as in his power, any accident or injury that may occur (u).

Upon an indictment for manslaughter, the evidence was, that the prisoner, being employed to drive a cart, sat in the inside instead of attending at the horse's head, and while he was sitting there, the cart went over a child, who was gathering up flowers on the road. Bayley, R., held that the prisoner, by being in the cart, instead of at the horse's head, or by its side, was guilty of negligence; and death having been caused by such negligence, he was guilty of manslaughter (v).

Upon an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that there were two omnibuses, which were running in opposition to each other, galloping along a road, and that the prisoner was driving that on which the deceased sat, and the witnesses for the prosecution stated that the prisoner was whipping his horses just before his omnibus upset. The defence was, that the horses in the omnibus driven by the prisoner took fright and ran away. Patteson, J., said : ' The question is, whether you are satisfied that the prisoner was driving in such a negligent manner that, by reason of his gross negligence, he had lost the command of his horses ; and that depends on whether the horses were unruly, or whether you believe that he had been racing with the other omnibus, and had so urged his horses that he could not stop them ; because, however he might be endeavouring to stop them afterwards, if he had lost the command of them by his own act, he would be answerable : for a man is not to say, " I will race along a road, and when I am got beyond another carriage I will pull up." If the prisoner did really race, and only when he had got past the other omnibus endeavoured to pull up, he must be found guilty ; but if you believe that he was run away with, without any act of his own, then he is not guilty. The main questions are, were the two omnibuses racing ? and was the prisoner driving as fast as he could, in order to get past the other omnibus ? and had he urged his horses to so rapid a pace, that he could not control them ? If you are of that opinion you ought to convict him ' (w).

S. and O. were indicted for the manslaughter of D. The prisoners, who were each driving a cart and horse, were seen two miles and a half from the place where the deceased was killed. S. there paid the toll. Both prisoners then appeared to be intoxicated. They were next seen at a bridge, over which they passed at a gallop, the one cart close behind the other. A person there told them to mind their driving ; this was 990 yards from the place where the deceased was killed. They were next seen forty-seven yards beyond the place where the deceased was killed. The carts were then going at a quick trot, one closely following the other. At a turnpike-gate a quarter of a mile from that place S., who appeared all along to have been driving the first cart, told the toll-gate keeper, ' We have driven over an old man ' ; and desired him to bring a light, and look at the name on the cart, on which O. pushed on his cart, and told S. to hold his bother, and they then started off at a quick pace. They were subsequently seen at two other places, at one of which S. said he had sold his concern to O. The surgeon stated that the deceased had a mark on his body, which would correspond with the wheel of a cart, and also several other bruises, and although he could not say that both carts had passed over the body, it was possible that both might have done so. For the prosecution it was contended, that it was perfectly immaterial in point of law whether one or both carts had passed over the deceased. The prisoners were in company, and had concurred in jointly driving and mechanically propelled vehicles as to vehicles drawn by animals or propelled by hand. For convictions of manslaughter by furiously riding a bicycle see R. v. Parker, 59 J. P. 793 ; R. v. Thirgood, 63 J. P. 442. As to motor-cars, see furiously along the road ; that was an unlawful act, and as both had joined in it, each was responsible for the consequences, though they might arise from the act of the other. For the prisoners it was urged that the evidence only proved that one of the prisoners ran over the deceased, and that the other was entitled to be acquitted. Pollock, C.B. : ‘ I think that is not so. I think the counsel for the Crown is right in his law. If two persons are in this way inciting each other to do an unlawful act, and one of them runs over a man, whether he be the first or the last, he would be equally liable. The person who runs over the man would be a principal in the first degree, and the other a principal in the second degree.’ And in summing up, Pollock, C.B., said : ‘ The prisoners are charged with contributing to the death of the deceased by their negligence and improper conduct ; and if they did so, it matters not whether he was deaf, or drunk, or negligent, or in part contributed to his own death ; for in this consists a great distinction between civil and criminal proceedings (x). If two coaches run against each other, and the drivers of both are to blame, neither of them has any remedy for damages against the other. But in the case of loss of life, the law takes a totally different view ; for there each party is responsible for any blame that may ensue, however large the share may be ; and so highly does the law value human life, that it admits of no justification wherever life has been lost, and the carelessness or negligence of any one person has contributed to the death of another person.’ He then directed the jury on the other point in the manner above mentioned (y).

On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the two prisoners were in a state of partial intoxication, and drove a gig along a road at a very rapid pace, and met three men, and at that time they were driving rapidly down a hill, and when the three men got to the top, which was thickly shaded with trees, they found the deceased lying insensible in the middle of the road, presenting all the appearance of having just been run over by some vehicle, and he shortly afterwards died. He had been deaf from his childhood, and had contracted an inveterate habit of walking all hours in the middle of the road, though he had been frequently warned of the probable consequences of doing so. It was contended that the prisoners ought to be acquitted, as the deceased had contributed to his own death. Rolfe, B., said : ‘ Whatever may have been the negligence of the deceased I am clearly of opinion that the prisoners would not be thereby exonerated from the consequences of their own illegal acts, which would be traced to their negligent conduct, if any such existed. I am of opinion, that if any one should drive so rapidly along a great thoroughfare leading to a large town, as to be unable to avoid running over any pedestrian who may happen to be in the middle of the road, it is that degree of negligence in the conduct of a horse and gig which amounts to an illegal act in the eye of the law, and, if death ensues from the injuries then inflicted, the parties driving are guilty of manslaughter, even though considerable blame may be attributed to the deceased. There is a very wide distinction between a civil action for pecuniary compensation for death arising from alleged negligence and a proceeding by way of indictment for manslaughter. The latter is a charge imputing criminal negligence, amounting to illegality; and there is no balance of blame in charges of felony; but wherever it appears that death has been occasioned by the illegal act of another, that other is guilty of manslaughter in point of law, though it may be that he ought not to be severely punished. If the jury should be of opinion that the prisoners were driving along the road at too rapid a pace, considering the time and place, and were conducting themselves in a careless and negligent way in the management of the horse and gig, I am of opinion that such conduct amounts to illegality, and that the prisoners must be found guilty on this indictment, whatever may have been the negligence of the deceased himself' (z).

Upon a trial for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner was standing up in a spring cart; the reins were not in his hands, but lying on the horse's back; while the horse was trotting down a hill with the cart, the deceased, a child about three years old, ran across the road before the horse, and the wheel of the cart knocked it down and killed it. It did not appear that the prisoner saw the child before the accident. Erle, J., told the jury, that if the prisoner had had the reins, and by using them could have saved the child, he was guilty of manslaughter; but if they thought he could not have saved the child by pulling the reins or otherwise by their assistance, they must acquit him (a).

Where on an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that the deceased was knocked down by a car driven by the prisoner, and great numbers were in the street at the time: Perrin, J., told the jury, that this unusual concourse of people, instead of offering any extenuation for the prisoner, or diminishing the criminality of his careless driving, if they found it to have been such, would but be a circumstance to add to it, and that it was his duty, as well as of all driving upon such occasions, to take more than ordinary precautions against accidents, and to use more than ordinary diligence for the safety of the public (b).

A person driving a carriage is not bound to keep on the ordinary side of the road; but if he does not do so, he is bound to use more care and diligence, and keep a better look-out, that he may avoid collision, than would be requisite if he were to keep to his proper side of the road (c).

Vessels (d).—An inquisition charged that the prisoner did 'propel and force' a vessel against a skiff, whereby the deceased was drowned. The counsel for the prosecution, in opening the case, said, that he apprehended that the rule as to traversing the river Thames was the same as that applicable to the mode of passing along any of the Queen's common highways: therefore, if the speed at which, or the manner in which, the prisoners were navigating the vessel, and were proceeding before they saw the skiff, was such as to prevent them, after they did see it, from stopping in time to prevent mischief to the person in it, they would be responsible for the offence of manslaughter, if his death happened in consequence ; if, on a misty night, the prisoners were proceeding at such a rate that they could not stop in time, their so proceeding was illegal, and, as death ensued, they were responsible. Parke, B. : ' You have stated the law most correctly. There is no doubt that those who navigate the Thames improperly, either by too much speed, or by negligent conduct, are as much liable, if death ensues, as those who cause it on a public highway, either by furious driving or negligent conduct ' (e).

On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner was a pilot, and was on board a Portuguese barque sailing down the Thames ; the barque was manned entirely by Portuguese, who did not understand English or nautical directions. The deceased was shrimping in a small boat, and while such occupation is going on the boat is kept motionless by the shrimp net. When the barque was about a quarter of a mile distant the boat made a signal to her, and when she was within twenty yards the deceased hailed her. The prisoner called to the Portuguese helmsman to turn the vessel to the starboard, but the helmsman, not understanding the prisoner's directions, steered to the larboard (i.e. port) ; the barque struck the deceased and killed him. Denman, C.J., after consulting Alderson, B., told the jury : ' The law is, that if the prisoner has produced the death by any conduct of his, he is guilty of manslaughter. It appears to me that he was the person guiding and directing the vessel, and that he is responsible for its management. It is extremely unfortunate that he did not, in the first instance, make the foreigners understand such simple directions as starboard and larboard. You will consider whether there was some negligence upon the part of the prisoner in not making the foreigners understand thoroughly. I take your opinion whether he was guilty of negligence in this respect, and whether that negligence caused the death. If you think so, you will find him guilty ' (f).

The captain and pilot of a steamer were indicted for manslaughter in causing a death by running down a smack, and it appeared that at the time the steamer started there was a man forward in the forecabin to keep a look-out, but at the time when the accident happened, which was about an hour afterwards, the captain and pilot were both on the bridge which communicates between the paddle-boxes ; the night was dark, and it was raining hard ; the steamer had a light at each end of the topsail yard ; an oyster smack, on board which the deceased was, was

(e) R. v. Taylor, 9 C. & P. 672. Parke, B., also said : ' The allegation in the indictment is, that the defendants forced and propelled the vessel against the skiff : evidence against those who gave the immediate orders will be necessary to sustain this allegation.' In R. v. Lloyd, 1 C. & P. 301, Garrow, B., where an indictment for manslaughter stated that the prisoner ' did compel and force A. B. and C. D. to leave ' a windlass, by means of which the death was occasioned, and it appeared that the prisoner, who was working one handle of the windlass, went away, and A. B. and C. D., then finding they were not strong enough to hold the windlass without him, let go their hold, by reason of which the deceased was killed, it was held that the words ' did compel and force ' must be taken to mean personal affirmative force applied to A. B. and C. D., and therefore the prisoner must be acquitted. These decisions turn on pleading points.

coming up the Thames without any light on board ; the deceased was below : a boy who was on board the smack stated that when the steamer struck the smack he got on board the steamer, and found nobody forward ; other witnesses were present to shew that no person was forward on the look-out at the time. Park, J., said, ' Then the captain is not responsible in felony ; it is the fault of the person who ought to be there, and who may have disobeyed orders ; if the captain leaves the pilot on the paddle-box, as he did here, he is not criminally responsible. In a criminal case every man is answerable for his own acts ; there must be some personal act ; these persons may be civilly responsible.' Alderson, B. : ' If you could shew that there was a man at the bow, and that the captain had said, " Come away, it 's no matter about looking out," that would be an act of misconduct on his part. If you can shew that the death of the deceased was the result of any act of personal misconduct on the part of the captain, you may convict him.' Park, J., said, ' Supposing he had put a man there, and had gone to lie down, and the man had walked away, do you mean to say he would be criminally responsible ? And you must carry it to that length, if you mean to make anything of it.' Alderson, B. : ' I think this case has arrived at its termination ; there is no act of personal misconduct or personal negligence on the part of these persons at the bar ' (g).

On a trial for manslaughter of a person who was burnt in a ship, where the prisoner had struck a light with a match, and lighted a candle, in a part of the ship forbidden by the ship's regulations, and had thrown down the match before it was extinguished, but a period of six hours elapsed without sign of fire by sight or smell ; Bramwell, B., thought the evidence too slight to justify a conviction (h).

Mines.—Where an indictment for manslaughter alleged that the prisoner was employed to superintend and keep in motion the working of an engine at a colliery for pumping out the water from the colliery, and thereby keeping a clear course for the passage of air and the dispersing of foul air, and that the prisoner neglected to superintend and keep in motion the working of the engine, and did thereby prevent a clear course being left for the passage of the air, and did cause noxious gases to accumulate, and then went on to state that an explosion took place and death ensued ; which allegations were proved. It was objected that the charge in the indictment was of non-feasance only and not of misfeasance and that mere non-feasance did not make a man criminally responsible. Wightman, J., ruled that the facts as charged did not constitute an indictable offence, observing that the indictment contained no direct allegation that it was the duty of the prisoner to do that which he was alleged to have neglected to do (i).

An indictment for manslaughter alleged that it was the duty of the prisoner to cause to be ventilated a coal mine, and to cause it to be kept free from noxious gases, and that the prisoner feloniously omitted to cause the mine to be ventilated, and that noxious gases accumulated and exploded, whereby the deceased was killed. It appeared that the deceased was killed by the explosion of fire damp in a colliery, of which the prisoner was a sort of manager, and it was imputed on the part of the prosecution that this explosion would have been prevented if the prisoner had caused an air-heading to have been put up, as it was his duty to have done. For the defence it was attempted to be proved that it was the duty of one of the persons killed to have reported to the prisoner that an air-heading was required, and that he had not done so. In summing up, Maule, J., said: 'The questions for you to consider are, whether it was the duty of the prisoner to have directed an air-heading to be made in this mine; and whether, by his omitting to do so, he was guilty of a want of reasonable and ordinary precaution. If you are satisfied that it was the plain and ordinary duty of the prisoner to have caused an air-heading to be made in this mine, and that a man using reasonable diligence would have done it, and that, by the omission, the death of the deceased occurred, you ought to find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter. It has been contended that some other persons were, on this occasion, also guilty of neglect; still, assuming that to be so, their neglect will not excuse the prisoner; for if a person's death be occasioned by the neglect of several, they are all guilty of manslaughter; and it is no defence for one, who was negligent, to say that another was negligent also, and thus, as it were, to try to divide the negligence among them' (j).

Upon an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner was an engineer, and his duty was to manage a steam engine employed for the purpose of drawing up miners from a coal pit; and when the skip containing the men arrived at the pit's mouth his duty was to stop the revolution of the windlass, so that the men might get out. On the day in question he deserted his post, leaving the engine in charge of an ignorant boy, who, before the prisoner went away, declared himself to the prisoner to be utterly incompetent to manage such a steam engine as the one entrusted to him. The prisoner neglected this warning, and threatened the boy, in case he refused to do as he was ordered. The boy superintended the raising of two skips from the pit with success; but on the arrival at the pit's mouth of the third, containing four men, he was unable to stop the engine, and the skip being drawn over the pulley, one of the men was thrown down the shaft of the pit, and killed on the spot. The engine could not be stopped, 'in consequence of the slipper being too low,' an error which any competent engineer could have rectified, but which the boy in charge of the engine could not. For the prisoner it was contended that a mere omission or neglect of duty could not render a man guilty of manslaughter (k). Campbell, C.J., said: 'I am clearly of opinion that a man may, by a neglect of duty, render himself liable to be convicted of manslaughter, or even of murder' (l).

Campbell discussed this case with Mr. Greaves, Q.C., and they fully concurred that a man might render himself equally culpable by neglecting to do his duty as by a wilful act. E.g., it is the duty of a pointsman to turn the switches on the approach

Upon a trial for manslaughter, it appeared that it was the prisoner's duty to attend to a steam engine, but on the occasion in question he had stopped the engine and gone away, and that, during his absence, a person came and put it in motion, and being unskilled was unable to stop it again, and in consequence of the engine being thus put in motion, the deceased was killed. Alderson, B., stopped the case, saying that the death was the consequence, not of the act of the prisoner, but of the person who set the engine in motion after the prisoner had gone away ; that it is necessary in order to a conviction for manslaughter, that the negligent act which causes the death should be that of the party charged (m).

Upon an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that the prisoner was a banksman at the top of a shaft of a colliery, where there were an engine and ropes to send down bricks and materials in a bucket, and draw up the empty baskets. It was his duty to send down materials, and to superintend the proper letting down of the buckets, and to place the stage hereinafter mentioned. The buckets were run on a truck on to a movable stage over half of the area of the top of the shaft, and there the bucket was attached and lowered down, the stage being removed. The prisoner on the occasion in question had omitted to put or cause to be put the stage on the mouth of the shaft, and in the absence of the stage a bucket with a truck and bricks ran along the tram-road, into the shaft, fell down the pit and killed the deceased. It did not appear that the prisoner was directing or driving the waggon at the time. It was left to the jury to say whether the accident happened by negligence of the prisoner, and whether that negligence arose from an act of omission or commission, and they found that the death arose from the negligent omission of the prisoner in not putting the stage on the mouth of the pit ; and, upon a case reserved, Lord Campbell, C.J., delivered judgment : ' We are of opinion that this conviction ought to be affirmed. It was the duty of the prisoner to place the stage on the mouth of the shaft ; the death of the deceased was the direct consequence of the omission of the prisoner to perform this duty ; if the prisoner, of malice aforethought, and with a premeditated design of causing the death of the deceased, had omitted to place the stage on the mouth of the shaft, and the death of the deceased had thereby been caused, the prisoner would have been guilty of murder. According to the common-law form of an indictment for murder by reason of the omission of a duty, it was necessary that the indictment should allege that it was the duty of the prisoner to do the act, or to state facts from which the law would infer this duty (n). But it has never been of a train, and if he wilfully neglects to do so, whereby an accident happens and a man is killed ; another man wilfully turns some points with which he has nothing to do, and a death occurs ; the offence of the one is precisely the same as that of the other. A man who wilfully neglects to feed his infant child is just as guilty of murder as if he poisoned it. In Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q.B. 29, Denman, C.J. said, that ' between wilful mischief and gross negligence the boundary line is hard to trace ; I should rather say, impossible. The law runs them into each other, considering such a degree of negligence as some proof of malice.' ' There must be negligence so great as to satisfy a jury that the offender had a wicked mind in the sense of being reckless and careless whether death occurred or not.' See R. v. Nicholls, 13 Cox, 75, Brett, J. R. v. Handley, 13 Cox, 79. R. v. Elliott, 16 Cox, 710.

doubted that if death is the direct consequence of the malicious omission of the performance of a duty (as of a mother to nourish her infant child) (o), this is a case of murder. If the omission was not malicious, and arose from negligence only, it is a case of manslaughter (p).

Railways.—The prisoner (who was indicted for manslaughter of G.) was employed by H., a colliery proprietor, who was also owner of a tramway crossing a turnpike road. It was the prisoner's duty to give warning to any persons when any trucks might cross the said road. The tramway was in existence before the road, and in the Act by which the road was made there was no clause imposing on H. the duty of placing a watchman where the tramway crossed the road. The deceased was crossing the tramway, having received no warning that any trucks were about to cross the road. As he was crossing, however, he was knocked down by some trucks, and was killed. On inquiry, it appeared that the prisoner was absent from his post at that time, although he had strict orders never to be absent. Lush, J., said, that there being no clause in the Act compelling H. to place a watchman where the tramway crossed the road, the prisoner was merely the private servant of H.; and that, consequently his negligence did not constitute such a breach of duty as to make him guilty of manslaughter (q).

The prisoner was a porter at the Brighton Station, and it was his duty to start the trains. It being an excursion day, three up trains came in succession, all of them late, so that none of them could be started at the proper time. There was a rule of the company, that under such circumstances no train should be started at intervals of less than five minutes after the preceding one. The case against the prisoner was that he had started the three trains so that there was only an interval of three or four minutes between the second and third. The first train arrived safely at the Clayton Tunnel (seven miles from Brighton), and passed safely through and the man at the Brighton end of the tunnel, when it entered, telegraphed 'train in'; but, owing to some improper working of the signal at his end, became confused, and on the arrival of the second train, not feeling certain that he had received the signal which authorised him to send on the second train, again telegraphed 'train in' just as the second train had gone into the tunnel. Fearing that the signal might be misunderstood, he shewed the red flag, which he supposed the second train had not seen, but which had the effect of pulling up the second train in the tunnel. He again telegraphed to ask 'is that train out?' upon which the man at the north end of the tunnel, supposing that this referred to the first train, telegraphed 'train out,' whereupon the porter at the Brighton end of the tunnel sent the third train into the tunnel, and this ran into the second, which had come to a standstill in consequence of seeing the red flag. Erle, C.J., is reported to have told the grand jury that 'they must be satisfied before they found the bill that there was a prima facie case of such criminal negligence as had been the proximate and efficient cause of the catastrophe. The negligence imputed appeared to be the sending of one train after another in a shorter interval of time than, according to the rules, he ought to have done. A mistake, indeed, was said to have arisen from the negligence of the defendant. Still, if the particular negligence imputed to the prisoner appeared not to have been the proximate cause of the catastrophe, the bill for manslaughter ought not to be found; and if it appeared that other causes had intervened, the prisoner's negligence would not have been the proximate and efficient cause of the deaths which had occurred. That this was in entire accordance with the authorities will appear from the most recent cases. The case is to be clearly distinguished from that of joint negligence. It is indeed well settled, that it is no defence in a case of manslaughter that the death was caused by the negligence of others as well as by that of the prisoner; for if the death of the deceased be caused partly by the negligence of others, the prisoner and all those others are guilty of manslaughter (r).

(o) The neglect on the part of the mother to provide for the child must be subsequent to the birth: thus mere failure on the part of the mother to make proper provision for her expected confinement resulting in the complete birth and subsequent death of a child does not amount to manslaughter (R. v. Izod, 20 Cox, 690, Channell, J.), though if the jury are satisfied that the mother, having made up her mind to be alone at the time of the birth, caused its death by wicked negligence after its birth, they should return a verdict of guilty. R. v. Handley, 13 Cox, 79, Brett, J., at p. 81.

(q) R. v. Smith, 11 Cox, 210. Query whether this case is accurately reported. In all probability the facts proved at the trial shewed that the prisoner had only neglected his duty to his employer by being absent from his post, and that the other servant managing the traffic, knowing he was absent, allowed the truck to cross the road. To have proved the prisoner guilty it must have been shown that he neglected some duty which he owed to the deceased as one of the public using the highway.

(r) R. v. Ledger, 2 F. & F. 857. Erle, C.J., referred to R. v. Haines, supra, p. 799, and R. v. Barrett, supra, p. 800. The great importance of placing the culpability of railway officials in a clear light has caused the following remarks, in which the words 'neglect' and 'negligence' are always used as importing such a degree of culpability as, if death ensued from it, the offence would amount to manslaughter at least. First, then, a clear distinction exists between negligence and a wilful act—a distinction well illustrated by the numerous cases, in which the rule has been established, that a master is answerable for the negligent, but not for the wilful act of his servant. And it should seem that if a railway official deliberately starts a train in direct opposition to the orders he has received, this is a wilful act, and that, as it is an intentional violation of his duty, it ought to be considered precisely in the same light as if it were done by a person who had no authority whatever to interfere with the train. Next, where a train is started before its proper time, and it runs into another train and kills a person, it seems that, whether the starting of the train be considered as a wilful or negligent act, the starter of the train is guilty of manslaughter. If the accident would not have happened if the train had not been started till its proper time the case seems clear from doubt, for there the too early starting of the train is manifestly the cause of the death; and supposing the accident would have happened had the train been started at the proper time, still the death was caused at the time when it occurred by the culpable conduct of the starter of the train; in other words, the death arose from the culpable act of the starter of the train, and sooner than it otherwise would have done, and the case seems to be very similar to those where the death of a person is accelerated by violence (ante, p. 692), and which establish the principle that if a man is caused by a wrongful act to die at any time earlier than he otherwise would have done, it is a case of manslaughter, and if the accelerating the death of a sick man be such an offence, it is not easy to suggest a reason why the accelerating the death of a healthy man is not so also. It must also be observed, that in such a case all that is certain is what has actually happened; it is mere speculation what might have happened if the train had been started at its proper time: the mere shifting of the deceased from one seat to another might have saved his life. Nor is it any excuse that the train which was run into was met with at a place at which it would not have been but for the wilful or negligent act of some other person: the answer to this excuse is, that the time for starting having been fixed expressly for the purpose of preventing the possibility of such accidents, whether they might arise from the preceding train being met with on the line through negligence or otherwise, it does

On an indictment for manslaughter against an engine-driver and fireman, it appeared that by the general rules of the railway company the fireman was always to follow the directions of the engine-driver, but both of them had the duty of looking out, the engineman being directed to attend to and act upon signals, the fireman obeying his directions. There was a regular system of signals, in which a red flag by day shewed that the train must stop instantly. On Ascot race day special instructions were issued, which materially differed from the regular rules, and by them the red signal did not mean, as it usually did, 'Stop,' but only 'Danger,' and that meant that the engine should proceed with caution. The rules prohibited engines from running tender foremost; but there was no turntable at Ascot, and the engines consequently returned with their tenders foremost. The return trains were started at irregular intervals of about five minutes by the station-master and traffic manager at Ascot. One of them stopped at Egham, and about five minutes afterwards another was started from Ascot. The prisoners who had charge of it, did not know that the preceding train would stop at Egham; the stoppage delayed it two or three minutes; when the prisoners' train passed the two stations before Egham the signal was red. There was contradictory evidence as to the pace their train went; but, after passing the auxiliary not lie in the starter's mouth to excuse his own wrongful act by such a wilful or negligent act of another. Lastly, it is submitted that the clear rule of the law is, that every one who contributes by his wilful or negligent act to the death of a man is guilty of manslaughter, although there be no community of purpose or action between them, and although the act of the one may be proximate to, and the acts of the others remote from, the immediate cause of death; and that the only correct question in these cases is, whether the act did in any way whatever contribute to the death. In R. v. Haines, the prisoner's duty was to cause an air-heading to be put in a mine; and it was alleged to be the duty of another person to report to the prisoner that an air-heading was wanting—such totally different duties that the neglect of either could not possibly be the joint neglect of the two parties. Now Maule, J., said: 'It has been contended that some other persons were also guilty of neglect; still, assuming that to be so, their neglect will not excuse the prisoner, for if a person's death be occasioned by the neglect of several, they are all guilty of manslaughter; and it is no defence for one who was negligent to say that another was negligent also, and thus as it were, try to divide the negligence among them.' The decision is directly against there being any limitation to joint negligence or proximate negligence, and, as far as it goes, entirely supports the position above laid down. Suppose three railway officials each negligently turned three different sets of points at A., B., and

C., and that the result was an accident and death, it is submitted that all of them would be guilty of manslaughter, provided the act of each contributed in any degree to the accident. So again, suppose A. and B. each negligently turned the points for two different trains, so that the trains were caused thereby to run into each other, can it admit of doubt that both would be responsible for the result? In R. v. Barrett, ante, p. 799, the decision turned on the defect in the indictment, which, being in the old form, contained no allegation that it was in the prisoner's duty to do that which he was alleged to have neglected to do. See also R. v. Swindall, ante, p. 796; and R. v. Longbottom, ante, p. 797, as to the negligence of the deceased forming no excuse.—C. S. G. Where a fatal railway accident had been caused by the train running off the line at a spot where rails had been taken up without allowing sufficient time to replace them, and also without giving sufficient, or at all events, effective warning to the engine-driver; and it was the duty of the foreman of plate-layers to direct when the work should be done, and also to direct effective signals to be given: Held, that though he was under the general control of an inspector of the district, the inspector was not liable; and that the foreman was so, assuming his negligence to have been a material and substantial cause of the accident, even although there had also been negligence on the part of the engine-driver, in not keeping a sufficient look-out. R. v. Bengel, 4 F. & F. 504.

signal before reaching Egham, the speed was slackened. The prisoners' train, not having to stop at Egham, went right through the station; a minute or two afterwards the engineer saw the preceding train, and tried to stop his train, but did not succeed in stopping the train before it ran into the other train, and caused the death of several persons. Willes, J., held that in a criminal prosecution an inferior officer must be held justified in obeying the directions of a superior not obviously improper or contrary to law; that is, if an inferior officer acted honestly upon what he might not unreasonably deem to be the effect of the orders of his superior, he would not be guilty of culpable negligence, these orders not appearing to him, at the time, to be improper or contrary to law. It appeared that the prisoners had nothing to do with the general management or regulation of the traffic, and their duty was to obey the special instructions issued to them as well as they could, presuming there was no apparent illegality in them; and in that case, provided they put the best construction they could upon them, and acted honestly in the belief that they were carrying them out, they were not criminally responsible for the result. In a civil case they might be responsible, but not criminally. As to the fireman, as he was bound to follow the direction of the engineman, there was no case. The jury then interposed, and said that they were all of opinion that there was no case of culpable negligence against either of the prisoners. Willes, J., said he was quite of the same opinion, and thought that the prisoners ought not to be convicted on a criminal charge. They had instructions of an unusual kind, and were doing their best at the time to prevent an accident; that is, they were trying to put on the brake so near to the time when, according to any view, they could be expected to have done so, that they can hardly be deemed guilty of culpable negligence. They only saw a red signal, and that, according to their special instructions, did not mean 'Stop.' There was no symptom of danger; they did not know that the other train had stopped at Egham, and they had no instructions to do so; and so they went right on, although a minute afterwards they did their best to stop the train. The arrangement was such as could not but cause imminent danger of the second train running into the first, which had passed only five or six minutes before, and had stopped three minutes at Egham. He therefore concurred in the verdict. In the course of the case, Willes, J., also held that a witness could not be asked to give an explanation as to his construction of the effect of the rules. The rules were in writing, and must speak for themselves, and the judge must declare their meaning. The special rules, if not consistent with the general rules, must override them, but their construction was for the judge. And that an officer of the Board of Trade could not be asked his opinion on the mode of conducting the traffic (which rather affected the company than the prisoners), nor whether in his judgment, as a man of experience, the driver of the engine ought to be convicted of negligence, nor (it seems) whether, in his opinion, the driver had kept a sufficient look-out ahead; but that he might be asked whether, supposing the train was going about forty miles an hour, it could have been stopped (s).

Steamships.—Where on a trial for manslaughter a steam tug, of which the prisoners were the captain and engineman, had exploded and killed the deceased whilst the prisoners, with the deceased, the stoker, were the only persons on board. The lever of the safety valve was found to have been so tied down by weights that it could not act as a safety valve. There was therefore considerably more pressure on the boiler plates than they could bear. There was a government valve, one of the keys to the lock of which was kept by a government inspector, and the other ought to have been in possession of the captain; but there was no proof that he had the key at the time of the explosion, and this valve was in such a state that it could not work. If it had been working, no mischief could have occurred. At the time of the explosion the tug was racing with a steamer, and had been so for some time. Against the captain it was urged that he had the control of the tug, and that he was guilty of culpable neglect in not seeing that the government valve was put into working order, or in allowing the other valve to be in a state in which it could not work. As to the engineer, it was his duty to attend to the working of the engine, and he was bound to see that too much steam was not generated. Hill, J., held that there was no case for a conviction. There was a difficulty in shewing that either of the prisoners were in a position to see that the government valve was out of order; and there was nothing inconsistent with the assumption that the deceased himself could see it to be out of order; and it was perfectly possible that he might have put the valve in order without the intervention of either of the prisoners; if so, it was clear that a felony could not be made out (t).

On an indictment for manslaughter it appeared that thirteen persons embarked in a boat, besides two watermen, of whom the prisoner was one; two witnesses proved, that by the swell of a steamer in motion the boat was carried against the bows of another steamer, and that as soon as it struck the prisoner called out to the passengers to sit still, but they all jumped up and tried to lay hold of the steamer, and in consequence the boat was upset. Had the passengers remained quiet, the witnesses believed the accident would not have happened. Another witness was of opinion that the fault lay in the prisoner's pushing off the boat from the stairs with one of the oars, he standing upright at the time, instead of being seated and having the command of the sculls; he ought to have known the danger under such circumstances of crossing the strong tide that rushed through the arch of the bridge; but for his pushing off as he did, the boat would have cleared the steamer. He thought the same thing might have happened to the boat if there had been only three persons in it or only one. Williams, J.: 'If the circumstance of the passengers jumping up really caused the accident, the overloading of the boat was immediately productive of such a result, and thus the prisoner is answerable; for he should have contemplated the danger of such a thing happening. If the fact of the prisoner standing up in the boat was the cause of the catastrophe, then it may be gross negligence on his part to have done so; because he is supposed to be acquainted with the force and other safety valve, or at least might have seen that it was so weighted.

velocity of the tide, and the danger of crossing it under the circumstances. On the whole it is a question for the jury, whether the deceased met his death either by the gross carelessness of the prisoner in the management of the boat, or in taking on board a greater number of passengers than it was capable of safely carrying' (u).

Contributory Negligence.—It has been generally held that it is no defence that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. The sole question for the jury is, did the negligence of the prisoner materially contribute to the death of the deceased (v). In R. v. Birchall (w), Willes, J., is reported to have said that a man was not criminally responsible for negligence for which he would not be responsible in an action, but on this case being cited in R. v. Jones (x), Lush, J., said that it was quite at variance with what he had always heard, and he ruled that there was no contributory negligence in merely getting into a vehicle and allowing himself to be driven, even though the driver was obviously drunk (y).

In R. v. Dant (z), it was held that if a commoner turns out on a common, across which there are public footpaths, a horse which he knows to be vicious and dangerous, and the horse kicks and kills a child, the commoner is liable to be convicted of manslaughter, even though the child has strayed on to the common a little way off the path (a).

In former editions reference was made to a local and personal Act (7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 75), (b) making it a misdemeanor to take on board wherries, &c., more persons than by law allowed, if any such persons should be drowned. The Act was repealed in 1859 (22 & 23 Vict., c. 133), and the particular portion was not re-enacted.

II. c. 31 (rep.), containing a more severe punishment for an offence of this kind, that it might serve as a caution to stage coachmen and others, who overload their carriage for the sake of lucre, to the great danger of the lives of their passengers, the number of whom are regulated by Act of Parliament. 1 East, P.C. 264.

(c) This section re-enacts 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 10, which Act by s. 1 repealed the Statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I. c. 9, under which the offender might be put to sue out a pardon. See Pollock and Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law, vol. ii, p. 477.

Excusable homicide is of two kinds: either per infortunium, by misadventure; or se et sua defendendo, upon a principle of self-defence. The term excusable homicide imports some fault in the party by whom it has been committed; but of a nature so trivial that the law excuses such homicide from the guilt of felony. Justifiable homicide is of several kinds: as it may be occasioned by the performance of acts of unavoidable necessity, where no shadow of blame can be attached to the party killing; or by acts done by the permission of the law, either for the advancement of public justice, or for the prevention of some atrocious crime.

SECT. I A.—OF EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE BY MISADVENTURE.

Homicide by misadventure is where in doing a lawful act, without any intention of bodily harm, and using proper precautions to prevent danger, one man unfortunately happens to kill another (d). The act must be lawful; for if it is unlawful, the homicide will amount to murder, or manslaughter, according to the attendant circumstances (e), and it must not be done with intent to inflict great bodily harm; for then the legality of the act, considered in the abstract, would be no more than a mere cloak, or pretence, and consequently would avail nothing. The act must also be done in a proper manner, and with due caution to prevent danger (f).

Thus, if people, in following their common occupations, use due caution to prevent danger, and nevertheless happen, unfortunately, to kill any one, such killing is homicide by misadventure (g). Thus where a person, driving a cart or other carriage, happens to drive over another and kill him, if the accident happen in such a manner that no want of due care could be imputed to the driver, it will be accidental death, and the driver will be excused (h). Where a person was riding a horse, and the horse, being whipped by some other person, sprang out of the road, and ran over a child and killed it, this was held to be misadventure in the rider, but manslaughter in the person who whipped the horse (i).

It has been shewn (j), that where parents, masters, and other persons, having authority in foro domestico, are giving to those under their care reasonable and moderate correction, if by the struggling of the party corrected, or by some other misfortune death ensue, the killing will be only misadventure (k).

As to accidental killing whilst engaged in a lawful sport, see ante, p. 786.

The punishment of excusable homicide seems never to have gone beyond forfeiture of some or all of the goods of the slayer (4 Bl. Com. 188. 1 Hale, 425. 1 Hawk. c. 29, s. 20. Fost. 281), and pardon and writ of restitution were granted as of course on paying the expense of suing them out. To prevent this expense it became usual to direct acquittal where the killing was obviously by misadventure or in self-defence (4 Bl. Com. 188. Fost. 288. 1 East, P.C. 222), and such practice is established as law by the enactment in the text.

SECT. I B.—OF EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE IN SELF-DEFENCE.

Homicide in self-defence is homicide committed se et sua defendendo, in defence of a man's person or property, upon some sudden affray, considered by the law as in some measure blameable, and barely excusable (l).

When a man is assaulted in the course of a sudden brawl or quarrel, he may, in some cases, protect himself by killing the person who assaults him, and excuse himself on the ground of self-defence. But, in order to entitle himself to this plea, he must shew first, that before a mortal stroke given he had declined further combat; secondly, that he then killed his adversary through mere necessity, in order to avoid immediate death (m). Under such circumstances, the killing will be excusable self-defence, sometimes expressed in the law by the word chance medley or casual affray (n).

Homicide upon chance medley borders very nearly upon manslaughter, and, in fact and experience, the boundaries in some instances are scarcely perceivable, though in consideration of law they have been fixed (o). In both cases it is supposed that passion has kindled on each side, and blows have passed between the parties; but in the case of manslaughter, it is either presumed that the combat on both sides had continued to the time the mortal stroke was given, or that the party giving such stroke was not at that time in imminent danger of death (p). The true criterion between them is stated to be this: when both parties are actually combating, at the time the mortal stroke was given, the slayer is guilty of manslaughter; but if the slayer has not begun to fight, or, having begun, endeavours to decline any further struggle, and afterwards, being closely pressed by his antagonist, kills him to avoid his own destruction, this is homicide excusable by self-defence (q).

In all cases of homicide excusable by self-defence, it must be taken that the attack was made upon a sudden occasion, and not premeditated, or with malice; and, from the doctrine which has been above laid down, it appears that the law requires that the person who kills another in his own defence should have retreated as far as he conveniently or safely could, to avoid the violence of the assault, before he turned upon his assailant; and that not fictitiously, or in order to watch his opportunity, but from a real tenderness of shedding his brother's blood. For in no case will a retreat avail, if it be feigned, in order to get an opportunity or interval to enable the party to renew the fight with advantage (r). The party assaulted must therefore flee, as far as he conveniently can, either by reason of some wall, ditch, or other impediment, or as far as the fierceness of the assault will permit him ; for it may be so fierce as not to allow him to yield a step without manifest danger of his life, or great bodily harm, and then, in his defence, he may kill his assailant instantly (s). Before a person can avail himself of the defence, that he used a weapon in defence of his life, he must satisfy the jury that that defence was necessary ; that he did all he could to avoid it ; and that it was necessary to protect his own life, or to protect himself from such serious bodily harm, as would give him a reasonable apprehension that his life was in immediate danger. If he used the weapon, having no other means of resistance, and no means of escape, in such case, if he retreated as far as he could, he would be justified (t).

Where the prisoner levelled a gun at the deceased, and it was a question whether the gun went off accidentally or not, Cockburn, C.J., left the following questions to the jury :—1. Was the discharge of the gun intentional or accidental ? (a) If intentional, was it from ill feeling to the deceased, or desire to get rid of him ? in which case it would be murder. (b) If it was not so done, was it done by the prisoner in self-defence, and to protect himself from death or serious bodily harm intended towards him by the deceased ? or (c) from the reasonable apprehension of it induced by the words and conduct of the deceased, though the latter may not, in fact, have intended death or serious injury ? (d) If not so, was it done after an assault made by the deceased on the prisoner, though short of an assault calculated to kill or cause serious bodily injury ? or (e) was it done under such a degree of alarm and bewilderment of mind, caused by the conduct of the deceased, as to deprive the prisoner, for the time, of his reason and power of self-control ? or (f) was the effect of the language and conduct of the deceased such as to provoke the angry passions of the prisoner so as to deprive him of his reason and power of self-control ? 2. If the discharge of the gun was accidental, in which case the prisoner cannot be convicted of murder, but may be of manslaughter. (a) Was the gun levelled by the prisoner at the deceased in self-defence against an attack of the deceased endangering life or limb, or reasonably apprehended by the prisoner as likely to do so, in either of which cases the prisoner would be entitled to an acquittal, or (b) was the gun levelled by the prisoner at the deceased unnecessarily under the circumstances, but without the intention of discharging it, in which case it would be manslaughter (u).

If A. challenges B. to fight, and B. declines the challenge, but lets A. know that he will not be beaten, but will defend himself ; and then B., going about his business and wearing his sword, is assaulted by A., and killed ; this is murder in A. But if B. had killed A. upon that assault, it had been se defendendo, if he could not otherwise have escaped ; or bare manslaughter, if he could have escaped and did not (v).

The law appears to be that if the blow, from the effect of which the deceased died, was given purely in self-defence, as distinguished from a desire to fight, it is excusable, and it is a question for the jury whether the prisoner struck the blow in self-defence, or whether he really desired to fight (w).

As in the case of manslaughter upon sudden provocation, where the parties fight upon equal terms, all malice apart, it matters not who gave the first blow : so in the case of excusable self-defence, it will seem that the first assault in a sudden affray, all malice apart, will make no difference, if either party quit the combat and retreat, before a mortal wound be given (x). According to this doctrine, if A., upon a sudden quarrel, assaults B. first and upon B.'s returning the assault A. really and bona fide flies, and being driven to the wall, turn again upon B. and kills him, this will be se defendendo (y) ; but some writers have thought this opinion too favourable, inasmuch as the necessity to which A. is at last reduced originally arose from his own fault (z). With regard to the nature of the necessity, it may be observed that the party killing cannot, in any case, substantiate his excuse, if he kill his adversary even after a retreat, unless there were reasonable ground to apprehend that he would otherwise have been killed himself (a).

Under the excuse of self-defence, the principal civil and natural relations are comprehended : therefore, master and servant, parent and child, husband and wife, killing an assailant in the necessary defence of each other, respectively, are excused ; the act of the relation assisting being considered the same as the act of the party himself (b). So where a son shot and killed his father, who was assaulting his mother, Lopes, J., told the jury that if the accused had reasonable grounds for believing, and honestly believed that his mother's life was in imminent peril, and that the shot which he fired was absolutely necessary for the preservation of her life, then he ought to be excused from the consequences of the homicide (c).

If A., in defence of his house, kills B., a trespasser, who is endeavouring to enter it, A. is guilty of manslaughter ; at least unless his life was in danger. But if B. enters the house, and A., having first requested him to depart, gently lays his hands upon him to turn him out, and then B. turns upon him and assaults him, and A. then kills him, it will be se defendendo, supposing that he was not able by any other means to avoid the assault, or retain his lawful possession (d). In such a case A., being in his own house, is not under an obligation to retreat as in other cases of self-defence, as that would be to give up the protection of his house to his adversary by his flight (e).

Necessity.—At the trial of an indictment for murder it appeared, upon a special verdict, that the prisoners, D. and S., seamen, and the deceased, a boy between seventeen and eighteen, were cast away in a storm on the high seas, and compelled to put into an open boat, that the boat was drifting on the ocean, and was probably more than a thousand miles from land; that on the twentieth day, when they had been nine days without food, and seven without water, D., with the assent of S., killed the boy, and both D. and S. fed on his flesh for four days; that at the time of the act there was no sail in sight, nor any reasonable prospect of relief; that under these circumstances there appeared to the prisoners every probability that unless they then, or very soon, fed upon the boy, or one of themselves, they would die of starvation: On a special verdict finding these facts it was held that there was no proof of any such necessity as could justify the prisoners in killing the boy, and that they were guilty of murder (f).

According to Hale, a man cannot even excuse the killing of another who is innocent, under a threat, however urgent, of losing his own life if he does not comply; so that if one man should assault another so fiercely as to endanger his life, in order to compel him to kill a third person, this would give no legal excuse for his compliance (g). But if the commission of treason may be extenuated by the fear of present death, and while the party is under actual compulsion (h), there seems to be no reason why homicide may not also be mitigated upon the like consideration, of human infirmity: though, where the party might have recourse to the law for his protection from the threats used against him, his fears would certainly furnish no excuse for committing the murder (i).

As the excuse of self-defence is founded on necessity, it can in no case extend beyond the actual continuance of that necessity, by which alone it is warranted (j): for if a person assaulted falls upon the aggressor, after the affray is over, or when he is running away, this is revenge, and not defence (k).

night he had lodged at the house, and some persons split open the door of the house in order to get the prisoner out and ill-treat him; Bayley, J., is reported to have said: 'If the prisoner had known of the back-way, it would have been his duty to have gone out backwards, in order to avoid the conflict.' 'But it is submitted that the protection of the house extends to each and every individual dwelling in it.' In R. v. Cooper, Cro. SECT. II.—OF JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE.

Justifiable homicide is of several kinds, as it may be occasioned by the performance of acts required by law, or done by the permission of the law (l).

The execution of criminals under a lawful sentence of death is an act required by the law, and, therefore, justifiable (m). But acts not required by law are not justifiable; and, therefore, wantonly to kill the greatest of malefactors, would be murder; and all acts of official duty should, in the nature of their execution, be in conformity with the judgment by which they are directed (n).

Amongst the acts done by the permission of the law, for the advancement of public justice, may be reckoned those of the officer, who, in the execution of his office, either in a civil or criminal case, kills a person who assaults and resists him. The resistance will justify the officer in proceeding to the last extremity. So that in all cases, whether civil or criminal, where persons having authority to arrest or imprison, and using the proper means for that purpose, are resisted in so doing, they may repel force with force, and need not give back; and if the party making resistance is unavoidably killed in the struggle, this homicide is justifiable (o). This rule is founded in reason and public utility; for few men would quietly submit to an arrest, if, in every case of resistance, the party empowered to arrest were obliged to desist, and leave the business undone; and a case in which the officer was held guilty of manslaughter, because he had not first given back, as far as he could, before he killed the party who had escaped out of custody, in execution for a debt, and resisted being retaken (p), seems to stand alone, and has been mentioned with disapprobation (q). As to the authority of constables and others to arrest, see ante, pp. 723 et seq. (r).

The protection above stated does not extend to sentries in the navy or army. The prisoner was sentinel on board a ship in the Royal Navy, when she was paying off. The orders to him from the preceding sentinel were, to keep off all boats, unless they had officers with uniforms in them, or unless the officer on deck allowed them to approach; and he received a musket, three blank cartridges, and three balls. The boats pressed; upon which he called repeatedly to them to keep off; but one of them persisted and came close under the ship; and he then fired at a man who was in the boat, and killed him. The jury found that the sentinel fired

(r) It has been said, that if peace officers meet with night-walkers, or persons unduly armed, who will not yield themselves, but resist or fly before they are apprehended, and who are upon necessity slain, because they cannot otherwise be overtaken, it is no felony in the officers or their assistants, though the parties killed were innocent (2 Hale, 89, 97). But it is doubtful whether nowadays so great a degree of severity would be either justifiable or necessary (especially in the case of bare flight), unless there was a reasonable suspicion of felony. See 1 East, P.C. 303. R. v. Dadson, 2 Den. 35. The old statute 2 Edw. III. c. 3, as to night-walkers is repealed, and the right to arrest misdemeanants by night rests on statutes. vide ante, pp. 729 et seq.

under the mistaken impression that it was his duty. On a case reserved, the judges were unanimous that the killing was, nevertheless, murder; but were of opinion, that if the act had been necessary for the preservation of the ship, as if the deceased had been stirring up a mutiny, the sentinel would have been justified (rr).

An officer of justice may justify the killing of a person flying from arrest for treason or felony (s). In the case of a riot or rebellious assembly, peace officers and their assistants, endeavouring to disperse the mob, are justified, both at common law and by the Riot Act, in proceeding to the last extremity, in case the riot cannot otherwise be suppressed (t). And it has been said, that perhaps the killing of dangerous rioters may be justified by any private persons who cannot otherwise suppress them, or defend themselves from them, inasmuch as every private person seems to be authorised by the law to arm himself for the preservation of the peace (u).

On an indictment for shooting, with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner was a constable and employed to guard a copse, from which wood had been stolen, and for this purpose carried a loaded gun. From this copse he saw the prosecutor come out, carrying wood which he was stealing, and called to him to stop. The prosecutor ran away, and the prisoner having no other means of bringing him to justice fired, and wounded him in the leg. It was further alleged that the prosecutor was actually committing a felony, he having been before convicted repeatedly of stealing wood (v); but these convictions were unknown to the prisoner, nor was there any reason for supposing that he knew the difference between the rules of law relating to felony and those relating to less offences. Erle, J., told the jury that shooting with intent to wound amounted to the felony charged, unless from other facts there was a justification; and that neither the belief of the prisoner, that it was his duty to fire, if he could not otherwise apprehend the prosecutor, nor the alleged felony, it being unknown to him, constituted such justification; and upon a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right; for the prisoner was not justified in firing, because the fact that the prosecutor was committing a felony was unknown to him at the time (w).

Prison officers are under the same special protection as constables (x) and other ministers of justice; and, therefore, if in the necessary discharge of their duty they meet with resistance, whether from prisoners in civil or criminal custody, or from others in behalf of such prisoners, they are not obliged to retreat as far as they can with safety, but may freely, and without retreating, repel force by force; and the killing of the party so resisting peace. And certainly, if private persons interfere to suppress a riot, they must give notice of their intention.

the gaoler, or his officer, or any person coming in aid of him, will be justifiable homicide (y).

H., being weary of life, and willing to be rid of it by the hand of another, having first blamed his keeper for suffering his deer to be destroyed, and commanded him to execute the law, came himself into his park at night as if with the intent to steal the deer; and being questioned by the keeper, who knew him not, and refusing to stand or answer, he was shot by the keeper. This was decided to be excusable homicide within 21 Edw. I. st. 2, De malefactoribus in parcis (z).

A man is justified in repelling force by force in defence of his person, habitation, or property, against one who manifestly intends and endeavours, by violence or surprise, to commit a felony upon either. In these cases he is not obliged to retreat, but may pursue his adversary till he finds himself out of danger; and if, in a conflict between them, he happens to kill, such killing is justifiable (a). But the rule does not apply to any crime unaccompanied with force, such as pocket picking (b). The intent to murder, ravish, or commit a felony attended with force or surprise, should be apparent, and not be left in doubt; so that if A. makes an attack upon B., it must plainly appear by the manner of the assault, the weapon, &c., that the life of B. is in imminent danger; otherwise his killing the assailant will not be justifiable self-defence (c). There must be an intention on the part of the person killed to rob, or murder, or to cause some serious bodily injury to the person killing; or the conduct of the party must be such as to render it necessary on the part of the party killing to do the act in self-defence (d). The rule extends only to felony; for if one comes to beat another, or to take his goods merely as a trespasser, though the owner may justify assaulting him so far as to make him desist, yet if he kills him, it is manslaughter (e). But if a house is broken open, though in the day-time, with a felonious intent, it will be within the rule (f). A person who was set to watch a yard or garden by his master, was held not to be justified in shooting anyone who came into it in the night, even if he saw him go into his master's hen-roost, and some dead fowls and a crow-bar be found near him; but if from the conduct of the trespasser he had fair ground to believe his own life in actual danger, he would be justified in shooting him (g).

In cases of this kind it is essential to ascertain the grounds which the slayer had for supposing that the person slain had a felonious design against him; more especially where it afterwards appears that no such design existed. One L. was indicted for killing F., under the following circumstances:—L. being in bed and asleep, his servant, who had procured F. to help her about the work of the house, and had gone to the door about twelve o'clock at night to let F. out, conceived that she heard thieves about to break into the house: upon which she ran to L., and told him of what she apprehended. L. arose immediately, took a drawn sword, and with his wife, went downstairs; when the servant, fearing that her master and mistress should see F., hid her in the buttery. L. with his sword searched the entry for thieves, when his wife spying F. in the buttery and not knowing her, conceived her to be a thief, and cried out to her husband in great fear, 'Here they be that would undo us;' when L., not knowing that it was F. in the buttery, hastily entered with his drawn sword, and being in the dark, and thrusting before him with his sword, thrust F. under the left breast, and gave her a mortal wound, of which she instantly died (h). This was ruled to be misadventure. Foster, J., appears to have thought that it would have been better ruled manslaughter; due circumspection not having been used (i). But in the view of East (j), upon the peculiar facts and circumstances of the transaction, the case is more properly one of those mentioned by Hale (k), where the ignorance of the fact excuses the party from all sort of blame. Hawkins mentions the case as one in which the defendant might have justified the fact under the circumstances, on the ground that it had not the appearance even of a fault (l).

Questions sometimes arise as to what is enough to establish that the deceased intended to commit such felony as would justify the slayer in killing him. M. on words of anger, threw a bottle with great force at the head of C., and immediately drew his sword, upon which C. returned a bottle with equal violence (m); and it was held that this was lawful and justifiable on the part of C., on the ground that he that has manifested malice against another, is not fit to be trusted with a dangerous weapon in his hand (n). There seems to have been good reason for C. to suppose that his life was in danger: and it was probably on the same ground that the judgment in Ford's case proceeded. F. being in possession of a room at a tavern, several persons insisted upon having it, and turning him out, which he refused to submit to; thereupon they drew their swords upon F. and his company, and F. drew his sword, and killed one of them; and this was adjudged justifiable homicide (o). For if several attack a person at once with deadly weapons, as may be supposed to have happened in this case, though they wait till he be upon his guard, yet it seems (there being no compact to fight) that he would be justified in killing any of the assailants in his own defence ; because so unequal an attack resembles more a desire of assassination than of combat (p). But no assault, however violent, will justify killing the assailant under the plea of necessity, unless there be a plain manifestation of a felonious intent (q). And it may be further observed, that a man cannot, in any case, justify killing another by a pretence of necessity, unless he were wholly without fault in bringing that necessity upon himself ; for, if he kills any person in defence of an injury done by himself, he is guilty of manslaughter at least ; as in the case where a body of people wrongfully detained a house by force, and killed one of those who attacked it, and endeavoured to set it on fire (r).

Foster, J., was of opinion, that upon the same principle upon which Mawgridge's case was decided, and possibly upon the rule touching the arrest of a person who has given a dangerous wound, the legislature, in the case of the Marquis de Guiscard, who stabbed Mr. Harley sitting in Council, discharged the parties who were supposed to have given the Marquis a mortal wound from all manner of prosecution on that account, and declared the killing to be a lawful and necessary action (s).

Where an act obviously felonious is attempted upon anyone, not only may the party assaulted repel force by force, but his servant attending him, or any other person present, may interpose to prevent the mischief ; and if death ensues, the party so interposing will be justified (t).

But, in cases of mutual combats or sudden affrays, a person interfering should act with much caution. Where, indeed, a person interferes between two combatants with a view to preserve the peace, and not to take part with either, giving due notice of his intention, and is under the necessity of killing one of them in order to preserve his own life or that of the other combatant, it being impossible to preserve them by other means, such killing will be justifiable (u) ; but, in general, if there is an affray and an actual fighting and striving between persons, and another runs in, and takes part with one party, and kills the other, it will not be justifiable homicide, but manslaughter (v).

It should be observed, that as homicide committed in the prevention of forcible and atrocious crimes is justifiable only upon the plea of necessity, it cannot be justified, unless the necessity continues up to the time when the party is killed. Thus, though the person upon whom a felonious attack is first made is not obliged to retreat, but may pursue the felon till he finds himself out of danger; yet if the felon is killed after he has been properly secured, and when the apprehension of danger has ceased, such killing will be murder; though perhaps, if the blood were still hot from the contest or pursuit, it might be held to be only manslaughter on account of the high provocation (w).

PART V.—OF INDICTMENTS AND EVIDENCE ON TRIALS FOR HOMICIDE, &c.

SECT. I.—INDICTMENT.

By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 6, 'In any indictment for murder or manslaughter, or for being an accessory to any murder or manslaughter, it shall not be necessary to set forth the manner in which or the means by which the death of the deceased was caused (x) but it shall be sufficient in any indictment for murder to charge that the defendant did feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, kill and murder the deceased; and it shall be sufficient in any indictment for manslaughter to charge that the defendant did feloniously kill and slay the deceased; and it shall be sufficient in any indictment against any accessory to any murder or manslaughter to charge the principal with the murder or manslaughter (as the case may be) in the manner hereinbefore specified, and then to charge the defendant as an accessory in the manner heretofore used and accustomed' (y).

Where several join in a murder, both the principal in the first degree and the principal in the second degree may be charged that they feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought murdered the deceased (z).

A count for being accessory after the fact to murder may be joined with a count for murder, and according to the preponderance of authority the Court will not in such case put the prosecution to elect on which count they will proceed (a).

And as 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 1 (b) has made accessories before the fact liable to be indicted as principals, an indictment may charge an accessory before the fact and a principal in the same manner in which two principals may be charged. And on such an indictment it is quite immaterial which (x) This applies equally where the death is due to a culpable omission. R. v. Smith, 11 Cox, 210.

(y) Taken from the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 100), s. 4, which applied only to indictments for murder or manslaughter. A serious doubt was entertained whether in an indictment against an accessory to murder or manslaughter, where the accessory was charged as an accessory and not as a principal, it might not still be necessary to adopt the old form of indictment, and in order to render that course unnecessary, the new parts of this section were introduced. S. 6 renders it unnecessary to refer to the old decisions as to the sufficiency of indictments for homicide.

The word 'indictment' includes a coroner's inquisition whereby any person is charged with murder or manslaughter, or as an accessory before the fact to either of those offences. R. v. Ingham, 33 L. J. Q.B. 183; 9 Cox, 508; post, p. 821. See R. v. G. W. Ry. Co., 3 Q.B. 333. R. v. King, 2 Cox, 95. 2 Co. Inst. 32, 550. 4 Co. Inst. 271.

(b) Ante, p. 130.

of the prisoners was principal in the first degree in the one case, or whether the party were accessory before the fact or a principal in the other case, and consequently the jury will be relieved from considering these questions (c).

Names.—Where the name of the person killed is known it should be correctly stated in the indictment: but errors and mis-descriptions can be amended. In the case of an infant or of an unknown person the proper description is a certain infant (male or female) child not named (d), or a certain person whose name is to the jurors unknown (e).

Time and Place.—It would seem to be unnecessary for the indictment to contain allegations of time and place (f). If a time is laid it would seem that the date of the striking the blow should be given. If from the evidence it appears that the deceased died more than a year and a day from this date the prisoner will be entitled to be acquitted of homicide (g) and in this sense no doubt the date is material.

Venue.—At common law murder, like all other offences, must be inquired of in the county in which it was committed. It appears, however, to have been a matter of doubt whether, when a man died in one county of a stroke received in another, the offence could be considered as having been completely committed in either county (h).

By 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 24, s. 2 it was enacted, that the trial should be in the county where the death happened. That enactment was repealed in 1826 (7 Geo. IV., c. 64, s. 32) but under ss. 12, 13, of the repealing Act (i) the prosecution may take place either in the county where the injury was given or in that in which the death took place. The venue, as stated in the margin of the indictment, is a sufficient allegation of the place (j).

In R. v. Bexley (k) the prisoner was indicted at the Central Criminal Court for the murder of her child aged eight weeks. She was seen one afternoon at Willesden, within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, and she there had the child with her and said she was going to see her parents in Suffolk. She arrived that night at a house in Suffolk, outside the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court; she there had a parcel with her, but apparently no child. She returned next day to Hicks*, 2 M. & Rob. 302, Coleridge, C.J., and Maule, J., an indictment for murder was held bad, because it neither named the child nor stated that its name was unknown, it was held that the prisoner could not be convicted of endeavouring to conceal the birth of the child; for the indictment being bad for its professed purpose was bad altogether. Willesden, taking the parcel with her. The parcel on being opened at Willesden was found to contain the dead body of the child. It was objected that there was no evidence that the death of the child took place within the jurisdiction of the Court, but Grantham, J., held that as the child was last seen alive within the jurisdiction and that the dead body was found within the jurisdiction in the prisoner's custody, the inference might be drawn that the murder was committed within the jurisdiction.

As to the trial of homicide committed abroad or in the Admiralty jurisdiction, vide ante, pp. 27, 32.

Describing Offence.—In an indictment for murder it has always been necessary to state that the act by which the death was occasioned was done feloniously, and of malice aforethought (l), and it must also be stated, that the prisoner murdered the deceased (m). If the averment respecting malice aforethought is omitted, and the indictment only alleges that the stroke was given feloniously, or that the prisoner murdered, &c., or killed, or slew the deceased, the conviction can only be for manslaughter (n).

Where the grand jury return the bill of indictment only a true bill for manslaughter, and ignoramus as to murder, it is stated to have been the usual course to strike out, in the presence of the grand jury, the words, 'maliciously' and 'of malice aforethought,' and 'murder,' and to leave only so much as makes the bill to be one for manslaughter (o); but it has been thought to be safer to present a new bill to the grand jury for manslaughter (p). And a learned judge has ordered this to be done where the grand jury have returned manslaughter upon a bill for murder, saying he thought it the better course to prefer a new bill, although the usual course on the circuit had been to alter the bill for murder, on the finding of the grand jury (q). Though the same indictment may charge one with murder and another with manslaughter, yet if it charges both with murder, the grand jury cannot find it a true bill against one, and manslaughter as to the other; but a finding against one for murder will be good, and there ought to be a new bill against the other for manslaughter (r). And where the grand jury returned a true bill for murder against one, and for manslaughter against another, the one was tried for murder on that indictment, but a new bill for manslaughter was preferred against the other (s).

If, as is very commonly the case, there be an indictment for murder, and a coroner's inquisition for the same offence against the same person, at the same sessions of gaol delivery, the usual practice is to arraign and try the prisoner upon both, in order to avoid the plea of autrefois acquit or convict; and to endorse his acquittal or conviction upon both presentments (t).

SECT. II.—CORONER'S INQUISITION.

Coroner's Inquisition.—By the Coroners Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 71), s. 3 (1), 'Where a coroner is informed that the dead body of a person is lying within his jurisdiction, and there is reasonable cause to suspect that such person has died either a violent or an unnatural death, or has died a sudden death of which the cause is unknown, or that such person has died in prison or in such place or under such circumstances as to require an inquest in pursuance of any Act (x), the coroner, whether the cause of death arose within his jurisdiction or not, shall, as soon as practicable, issue his warrant for summoning not less than twelve nor more than twenty-three good and lawful men to appear before him at a specified time and place, there to inquire as jurors into the death of such person as aforesaid.'

By sect. 4 (2), 'It shall be the duty of the coroner in a case of murder or manslaughter to put into writing the statement on oath of those who know the facts and circumstances of the case, or so much of such statement as is material, and any such deposition shall be signed by the witness and also by the coroner.'

By sect. 4 (3), 'After viewing the body and hearing the evidence the jury shall give their verdict and certify it by an inquisition in writing, setting forth . . . who the deceased was, and how and where the deceased came by his death, and if he came by his death by murder or manslaughter, the persons, if any, whom the jury find to have been guilty of such murder or manslaughter, or of being accessories before the fact to such murder (y).

(y) The inquisition must be under the hands and in the case of murder or manslaughter under the seals of the jurors who concur (s. 18 (1)). Such an inquisition amounts to an indictment, R. v.

Ingham, 5 B. & S. 257. See ante, p. 818. Although the prisoner may be charged with murder or manslaughter by the inquisition of the coroner, it is usual also to prefer an indictment against him. By 50 & 51 Vict. c. 71, s. 20, if in the opinion of the Court having cognizance of the case, an inquisition finds sufficiently the matters required to be found thereby, and, where it charges a person with murder or manslaughter, sufficiently designates that person and the offence charged, it shall not be quashed for any defects, but may be amended by the proper officer of the Court. The jurisdiction of the King's Bench Division to quash an inquisition for irregularity on the face of it is left untouched by this section. R. v. G. W. Ry. Directors, 20 Q.B.D. 410; 16 Cox, 410. If particulars are set out professing to show facts justifying the verdict the inquisition may be quashed if they are

By sect. 4 (5), 'In case twelve at least of the jury do not agree on a verdict the coroner may adjourn the inquest to the next sessions of oyer and terminer or gaol delivery held for the county or place in which such inquest is held, and if, after the jury have heard the charge of the judge or commissioner holding such sessions, twelve of them fail to agree on a verdict, the jury may be discharged by such judge or commissioner without giving a verdict.'

By sect. 6, power is given to the High Court of Justice, on application by or under the authority of the Attorney-General, to order an inquest to be held if the coroner refuses or neglects to hold one, or where it is necessary in the interests of justice that another inquest should be held.

By sect. 7 (1), 'The coroner only within whose jurisdiction the body of a person upon whose death an inquest ought to be holden is lying shall hold the inquest, and where a body is found dead in the sea or any creek, river, or navigable canal within the flowing of the sea, where there is no deputy coroner for the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, the inquest shall be held only by the coroner having jurisdiction in the place where the body is first brought to land.

(2). 'In a borough with a separate Court of quarter sessions, no coroner, save as is otherwise provided by this Act, shall hold an inquest belonging to the office of coroner except the coroner of the borough or a coroner or deputy coroner for the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England.'

By subsect. 3, in a borough having no separate Court of quarter sessions, only the county coroner or the coroner or deputy coroner for the jurisdiction of the Admiralty shall hold an inquest.

By sect. 40 (1), 'For the purpose of holding coroners' inquests, every detached part of a county shall be deemed to be within the county by which it is wholly surrounded, or where it is partly surrounded by two or more counties, within the county with which it has the longest common boundary.'

SECT. III.—EVIDENCE.

The evidence, in cases of murder, will consist of the proof of the particular facts and circumstances which shew the killing, and that it was committed by the party accused of malice aforethought. It should be observed, however, that when the fact of killing is proved, all the circumstances of accident, necessity, or infirmity, are to be satisfactorily shewn by the prisoner, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him; for the law presumes the fact to have been founded in malice until the contrary appears (z).

Corpus delicti.—It has been considered a rule, that no person should be convicted of murder unless the body of the deceased has been found; and Hale says, 'I would never convict any person of murder or manslaughter, unless the fact were proved to be done, or at least the body be found dead' (a). But this rule or caution must be taken with some insufficient in law to constitute the offence found. R. v. Clerk of Assize of Oxford Circuit [1897], 1 Q.B. 370.

(z) Post. 255. Ante, p. 657.

(a) 2 Hale, 290. This is only a caution, not a rule for every case. R. v. Burton, Dears. 282, Maule, J. R. v. Kersey, 1 Cr. App. R. 260.

qualifications ; and circumstances may be sufficiently strong to shew the fact of the murder, though the body has never been found. Thus, where the prisoner, a mariner, was indicted for the murder of his captain at sea, and a witness stated that the prisoner had proposed to kill the captain, and that the witness being afterwards alarmed in the night by a violent noise, went upon deck, and there observed the prisoner take the captain up and throw him overboard into the sea, and that he was not seen or heard of afterwards ; and that near the place on the deck where the captain was seen, a billet of wood was found, and that the deck and part of the prisoner's dress were stained with blood ; the Court, though they admitted the general rule of law, left it to the jury to say, upon the evidence, whether the deceased was not killed before his body was cast into the sea ; and the jury being of that opinion, the prisoner was convicted, and (the conviction being unanimously approved by the judges) was afterwards executed (b).

And where the mate of a ship was seen to seize the captain from behind, and throw him into the sea, and the captain fell striking a boat, and leaving marks of blood upon it, but was never seen again, Archibald, J., allowed the case to go to the jury, and the prisoner was convicted of manslaughter (c).

But where upon an indictment against the prisoner for the murder of her bastard child, it appeared that she was seen, with the child in her arms, on the road from the place where she had been at service to the place where her father lived, about six in the evening, and between eight and nine she arrived at her father's, without the child, and the body of a child was found in a tide-river, near which she must have passed in her road to her father's, but the body could not be identified as that of the child of the prisoner, and the evidence rather tended to shew that it was not the body of such a child ; it was held that she was entitled to be acquitted ; the evidence rendered it probable that the child found was not the child of the prisoner ; and with respect to the child, which was really her child, the prisoner could not by law be called upon either to account for it, or to say where it was, unless there were evidence to shew that her child was actually dead (d).

The true principle seems to be that the rule is properly applicable only in cases where it is sought to presume death from the disappearance of the person said to be deceased (e).

(b) R. v. Hindmarsh, 2 Leach, 569. It was argued at the trial that the prisoner was entitled to be acquitted, on the ground that it was not proved that the captain was dead ; and that as there were many ships and vessels near the place where the transaction was alleged to have taken place, the probability was that he was taken up by some of them, and was then alive. And counsel mentioned a case before Gould, J., in which the mother and reputed father of a bastard child were observed to take the child to the margin of the dock at Liverpool, and after stripping it, cast it into the dock. The body of the infant was not afterwards seen ; and as the tide of the sea flowed and reflowed into and out of the dock, the learned judge, upon the trial of the father and mother for the murder of their child, observed that it was possible the tide might have carried out the living infant ; and upon this ground the jury, by his direction, acquitted the prisoners. But qu. the form of the indictment in this case.

A question has sometimes been raised whether a prisoner can be convicted of murder where it is impossible for any evidence to be given of the cause of death, in consequence of the state in which the body was found, but it would seem that it is a question for the jury, taking all the circumstances into consideration, whether the death was caused by violence or not, and whether that violence was the act of the prisoner (f).

On a trial for murder, in order to prove the state of the health of the deceased prior to the day of his death, a witness was asked in what state of health the deceased seemed to be when he last saw him, and he began to state a conversation which had then taken place between the deceased and himself on this subject. Alderson, B., held that what the deceased said to the witness was reasonable evidence to prove his state of health at the time (g).

Upon an indictment for murder by the explosion of certain grenades, a novel kind of explosive instrument, evidence of other deaths and wounds caused by the explosion at the same time and place was held admissible for the purpose of proving the character of the grenades (h). Where in the same case a witness was called to prove that he made the grenades, it was held that the name of the person who gave the order for them might be proved, as a fact in the transaction, even though he had not then been shewn to be connected with the prisoner (i).

It has already been shewn that if A. is indicted as having given the mortal stroke, and B. and C. as present aiding and assisting, and upon the evidence it appeared that B. gave the stroke, and A. and C. were aiding and assisting, or it be not proved which gave the stroke, the charge is proved, for in law it is the stroke of all (j). So if a prisoner is indicted for strangling the deceased with her own hands, and upon the evidence it turns out that the deceased was strangled by someone else in the presence of the prisoner, who was privy to it, and so near as to be able to assist, that is sufficient (k).

An indictment for murder, stating that the prisoner gave and administered poison, is supported by proof that the prisoner gave the poison to A. to administer as a medicine to the deceased, and that A. neglecting to do so, it was accidentally given to the deceased by a child, the prisoner's intention to murder continuing. Upon an indictment for murder, which alleged that the prisoner feloniously, &c., did administer a large quantity of laudanum to a child, it appeared that the prisoner delivered to one S., with whom the child was at nurse, about an ounce of laudanum, telling her that it was proper medicine for the child, and directing her to administer to the child every night a tea-spoonful thereof, which was quite a sufficient quantity to kill the child; the prisoner's intention in so doing, as shewn by the finding of the jury, was to kill the child. S. took home the laudanum, and thinking the child did not require medicine, did not intend to administer it all, and left it on the mantel-piece of her room. A few days afterwards a little boy of S., during her accidental absence, removed the laudanum from its place and administered a much larger dose than a tea-spoonful to the child, in consequence of which the child died. The jury were directed that if the prisoner delivered the laudanum to S. with intent that she should administer it to the child, and thereby produce its death, the quantity so directed to be administered being sufficient to cause death; and that, if the laudanum was afterwards administered by an unconscious agent, while the prisoner's original intention continued, the death of the child, under such circumstances, was murder by the prisoner, and that if the tea-spoonful was sufficient to produce death, the administration of a much larger quantity by the little boy would make no difference. The jury found the prisoner guilty, and, upon a case reserved for the opinion of the judges, whether the facts above stated constituted an administering of the poison by the prisoner to the child, they were unanimously of opinion that the administering of the poison by the child was, under the circumstances of the case, as much, in point of law, an administering by the prisoner, as if she had actually administered it with her own hand (l).

Upon an indictment, alleging that the prisoner did an act which caused the death, it is sufficient to prove that the prisoner caused and procured the act to be done by an innocent agent. An indictment charged that the prisoner feloniously did place and fix upon the head of the deceased a certain plaster made by the prisoner of certain dangerous ingredients. The prisoner was proved to have applied two plasters to the head of the deceased, but a third, which was the last applied before the deceased died, was applied by the child's mother, in the absence of the prisoner, it being made with materials which had been given by the prisoner to the mother for that purpose; it was objected that the indictment was not proved; but it was held that, though indictments often go on to say that the prisoner 'caused and procured' the thing to be done, yet if the plaster was made by the direction of the prisoner, that was enough (m).

One important species of evidence occasionally resorted to in cases of homicide, namely, the dying declaration of the party killed, is dealt with post tit. 'Evidence,' Vol. ii. p. 2084.

Where the facts of the case amount only to excusable homicide, it is usual for the judge to direct a general verdict of acquittal, unless some criminal culpability appears to attach to the conduct of the party (n). And several persons present at a homicide may be found guilty in different degrees, one of murder, the other only of manslaughter (o).

In every case where the point turns upon the question whether the homicide was committed wilfully and maliciously, or under justifying, excusing, or alleviating circumstances, the matter of fact, namely, whether the facts alleged by way of justification, excuse, or alleviation, are true is the proper and only province of the jury. But whether, upon a supposition of the truths of the facts, such homicide be justified, excused, or alleviated, must be submitted to the judgment of the Court; for the construction which the law puts upon facts stated and agreed, or found by a jury, is in this, as in all other cases, undoubtedly the proper province of the Court (p). In cases of doubt and real difficulty, the jury may be directed to state facts and circumstances in a special verdict (q). But where the law is clear, the jury, under the direction of the Court in point of law, matters of fact being still left to their determination, may find a general verdict, conformably to such direction (r). On a trial for murder, if the jury cannot agree, the presiding judge may discharge them and the prisoner may be tried again at the same or later assizes (s). Where it is deemed inexpedient or unjust to retry the prisoner, a nolle prosequi may be entered by the Attorney-General and the prisoner released without requiring him to be re-arraigned (t).

SECT. IV.—CONVICTIONS OF OFFENCES NOT SPECIFICALLY CHARGED.

A person may be convicted of manslaughter on an indictment for murder (u). And where the indictment is for the murder of a newly-born child the defendant may be acquitted of the murder and convicted of concealment of birth (v).

A person indicted as accessory after the fact to murder, may be convicted as accessory after the fact to manslaughter, if the offence of the principal turns out to be manslaughter (w). Either assisting the party to conceal the death, or in any way enabling him to evade the pursuit of justice, will render a party who knows the offence to have been committed, an accessory after the fact (w). A conviction as accessory after the fact to homicide upon an indictment as a principal, or as an accessory before the fact is bad (x).

On an indictment for the manslaughter of a person under 16 by a person over 16 who had the custody, care, or charge of the deceased, the jury may acquit of manslaughter and convict of cruelty (y).

It has not been determined whether under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9 (z), a person indicted for murder might be convicted of an attempt to murder, e.g. where the death was after a year and a day from the felonious act, or was due to some other cause than the felonious act. In one case it was ruled that a previous acquittal of murder was no bar to an indictment for attempting to commit murder on the ground that 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9, applies only to an attempt which is a misdemeanor (a). But this case is of doubtful authority (b).

Criminal Liability of Corporation.—A corporation is not subject to indictment upon a charge of any crime the essence of which is either personal criminal intent or such a degree of negligence as amounts to a wilful incurring of the risk of causing injury to others. R. v. Great West Laundry Co. (1900), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 514 (Man.). Sections 247 and 252, as to want of care in the maintenance of dangerous things, do not extend the criminal responsibility of corporations beyond what it was at common law. Ibid.

Although a corporation cannot be guilty of manslaughter, it may be indicted under Code sec. 222 and possibly also under sec. 284, for having caused grievous bodily injury by omitting to maintain in a safe condition a bridge or structure which it was its duty to so maintain, and this notwithstanding that death ensued at once to the person sustaining the grievous bodily injury. R. v. Union Colliery Co. (1900), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 523 (B.C.), affirmed, 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 400, 31 Can. S.C.R. 81.

Under sec. 247 a corporation may be indicted for omitting, without lawful excuse, to perform the duty of avoiding danger to human life from anything in its charge or under its control. The fact that the consequence of the omission to perform such duty might have justified an indictment for manslaughter in the case of an individual is not a ground for quashing the indictment. Union Colliery Co. v. R. (1900), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 400, 31 Can. S.C.R. 81.

As the Criminal Code provides no punishment for the offence as against a corporation, the common law punishment of a fine may be imposed on a corporation indicted under it. Ibid.

The manager of a corporation is not criminally liable as for wilful disobedience of a statute under Code sec. 164 in respect of the corporation's neglect not due to any active participation on his part, to perform a statutory duty imposed upon it. R. v. Hays (1907), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 423.

There are offences such as assaults which it is physically impossible for a corporation to commit, but for such offences as they can commit, whether of misfeasance or malfeasance, and for which the prescribed punishment is one which they can be made to endure, they are as amenable to the criminal law as are natural persons. R. v. Central Supply Association (1907), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 371.

"If it were the fact that the Board of Directors or the general manager of the defendants' company, or anyone responsible directly or indirectly for the system carried on in the transportation of explosives, resided within the jurisdiction of this Court, I should have recommended their being indicted as well as the company. It is right and just that employees of whatever grade shall be placed upon trial when any negligence of theirs caused wounds or death, and the higher officers through whom a defective system is put on or kept in operation should not escape." Per Riddell, J. R. v. Michigan Central Ry. (1907).

In Ex parte Brydges (1874), 18 Lower Canada Jurist 141, the application was upon the return of rules nisi to quash a coroner's inquisition (which then had an effect similar to an indictment) and for the discharge of Mr. Brydges' recognizance, under the following circumstances:—A man named Cauchon had been killed by a G.T.R. train at a level crossing. Mr. Brydges was the managing director of the railroad and on complaints made that the crossing was particularly dangerous, had admitted the fact and promised the Attorney-General that he would have a watchman placed there. He did not place a watchman as promised and the fatality to Cauchon resulted. The finding of the coroner's jury was quashed because it was insufficient in form and did not sufficiently charge a criminal offence.

The Party Killed.

When a Child Becomes a Human Being.—Code sec. 251.

Killing an Unborn Child.—Code sec. 306.

Where the accused, a member of a tribe of pagan Indians, killed that which he believed was an evil spirit, called a Wendigo, embodied in human flesh, but which was in fact his own foster-father, the trial Judge directed the jury that "as a matter of law there is here no justification for the killing, and culpable homicide without justification is manslaughter." The jury found the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, and a cause was reserved for the consideration of the Court of Appeal, which said: "Upon the case reserved, if there was evidence upon which the jury could find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter it is not upon us to reverse that finding, and the question we have to decide is whether there was such evidence. We think there was, and therefore do not see how we can say that the prisoner was not properly convicted of manslaughter." Machekequonabe v. The Queen, 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 140.

Sec. 4.—Of the Means of Killing and of Causing Death by Malicious and Intentional Neglect of Duty.

Acceleration of Death.—Code sec. 258.

Neglect of Duty.

Duty of Persons.

- (a) In charge of another to provide necessities of life. Code sec. 241.
- (b) In charge of family to provide necessities. Code sec. 242.
- (c) Of masters, to provide necessities. Code sec. 243.
- (d) Undertaking acts dangerous to life. Code sec. 246.
- (e) To avoid omissions dangerous to life. Code sec. 248.
- (f) In charge of dangerous things. Code sec. 247.
- (g) Act or omission accelerating death. Code sec. 256.
- (h) Neglect of proper means. Code sec. 257.

Medical Aid.

A person who engages the services of a child under sixteen years, placed out with him by his legal guardian under a contract for the child's services for a fixed period, whereby the party with whom he is placed engages to furnish the child with board, lodging, clothing, and necessities, is not as to such child a "guardian or head of a family" so as to become criminally responsible as such, under sec. 242 for omitting to provide "necessaries" to such child while a member of his household. The relationship in such case is that of master and servant, and comes within the provisions of sec. 243, under which the master is criminally responsible only in respect of a failure to provide "necessary food, clothing or lodging." R. v. Coventry, 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 541. Sec. 243 of the Code does not impose a criminal responsibility upon the master to provide the servant with medical attendance or medicine.

Medical attendance and remedies are necessities within the meaning of Code secs. 241 and 242 and also at common law, and anyone legally liable to supply such is criminally responsible for neglect to do so. R. v. Brooks (1902), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 372, 9 B.C.R. 13; R. v. Lewis (1903), 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 261, 6 O.L.R. 132. Conscientious belief that it is against the teaching of the Bible and therefore wrong to have recourse to medical attendance and remedies is no excuse. Ibid.

If a person having the care and custody of another who is helpless, neglects to supply him with the necessities of life and thereby causes or accelerates his death he was guilty of a criminal offence even before the statute. R. v. Nasmith (1877), 42 U.C.Q.B. 242. But if a person over the age of sixteen (see sec. 243) and having the exercise of free will, chooses to stay in a service where bad food and lodging are provided and death is thereby caused, the master is not criminally liable.

By Influence of Mind.—Code sec. 255.

By Want of Medical or Surgical Skill.

A woman practising "Christian Science" and not called in as a medical attendant was held not guilty of manslaughter where the only treatment by her was to sit silently by the patient, a child ill of diphtheria, although the child's life might have been saved or prolonged had proper medical aid been called in. R. v. Beer, 32 C.L.J. 416. But the aiding and abetting the person charged with the duty of providing necessities is punishable in like manner as the principal offence. See Code sec. 69. R. v. Brooks (1902), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 372, 9 B.C.R. 13; R. v. Lewis (1903), 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 261, 6 O.L.R. 132.

By Perjury.—Code sec. 174(2).

By Infection.—The theory of the defence in an indictment for murder, was that the death was caused by the communication of small-pox virus by Dr. M., who attended the deceased, and one of the witnesses for the defence explained how the contagion could be guarded against. Dr. M. had not in his examination in chief or cross-examination been asked anything on this subject; it was held that he was properly allowed to be called in reply, to state that precautions had been taken by him to guard against the infection. R. v. Sparham and Greaves, 25 U.C.C.P. 143.

By Rape.—A practising physician who kept an hospital for the sick, on three successive days forced the person of B. a patient then under his control in such hospital, she being in a condition of health that rendered sexual intercourse dangerous even with her consent. B. died on the sixth day after the last occasion on which she had been ravished, and her death was hastened if not caused thereby. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to justify A.'s surrender under the Ashburton Treaty for extradition on a charge of murder. Re Weir, 14 Ont. R. 389.

Sec. 5.—Time of Death. Treatment of Wounds. Killing Persons Labouring Under Disease.

Time of Death.—Death within a year and a day. Code sec. 254.

The prisoner was convicted of manslaughter in killing his wife, who died on November 10th, 1881. The immediate cause of her death was acute inflammation of her liver which the medical testimony proved might be occasioned by a blow or a fall against a hard substance. About three weeks before her death the prisoner had knocked his wife down with a bottle; she fell on the floor and remained insensible for some time; she was confined to her bed soon afterwards and never recovered. Evidence was given of frequent acts of violence committed by the prisoner upon his wife within a year of her death by knocking her down, and kicking her in the side. On questions reserved, whether the evidence was properly received of assaults and violence committed by the prisoner upon the deceased prior to the date of death or prior to the occasion on which he had knocked her down with the bottle, and whether there was any evidence to leave to the jury to sustain the charge, it was held by the Supreme Court of Canada, affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, that the evidence was properly received and that there was evidence to submit to the jury that the disease which caused her death was produced by the injuries inflicted by the prisoner. Theal v. The Queen, 7 Can. S.C.R. 397.

Sec. 6.—Provocation.

All questions as to motive, intent, heat of blood, etc., must be left to the jury, and should not be dealt with as propositions of law. R. v. McDowell (1865), 25 U.C.Q.B. 108, 115.

Although by sec. 229(3) no one shall be held to give provocation to another by doing that which he had a legal right to do, it is for the jury and not for the Judge to determine any preliminary question of fact upon which the alleged legal right depends. R. v. Brennan (1896), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 41, 27 Ont. R. 659.

On a trial for murder if the trial Judge directs the jury that imminent peril of the prisoner's own life, or of the lives of his family, is a ground for justification for killing, in defence of his household, one of a party committing an unprovoked assault upon him, but does not direct them that a reasonable apprehension of immediate danger of grievous bodily harm to the prisoner or to his wife and family is an equal justification, such omission constitutes a substantial wrong or miscarriage occasioned on the trial (Cr. Code sec. 1019) where the circumstances shewn in evidence are such as to point much more to the latter ground of justification than to the former, and a new trial should be ordered. R. v. Theriault (1894), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 444 (N.B.); Code secs. 53 and 55.

In the case of a sudden quarrel, where the parties immediately fight, there may be circumstances indicating malice in the party killing, which killing will then be murder. R. v. McDowell (1865), 25 U.C.Q.B. 108.

Treatment of Wounds.—Code sec. 258.

Sec. 9.—Killing in Prosecution of Criminal, Unlawful, Wanton Purpose.

Where Several Join to do an Unlawful Act.—Where a package of revolvers was thrown into a carriage in which three prisoners conjointly charged with a crime were being conveyed under lawful arrest and the prisoners all struggled to obtain revolvers, two of them succeeding in doing so, whereupon all of them attempted to effect a forcible escape, during which one of the peace officers was shot dead by one of the prisoners, but by which of them is unknown, proof that the defendant had one of the revolvers in the melee, and had ordered another of the peace officers to “give up” immediately after another of the prisoners had told the defendant to “give it to him,” is with such facts, sufficient evidence of a conspiracy by the three prisoners for an unlawful purpose, to wit, the escape, and of a common design to use for its accomplishment any amount of violence or force, and a conviction of the defendant for murder is, therefore, proper without proof that he fired the fatal shot. It was proper for the trial Judges to instruct the jury that “where all the parties proceed with the intention to commit an unlawful act and with the resolution or determination to overcome all opposition by force, that if by reason of such resolution one of the party is guilty of homicide, his companions would be liable to the penalty which he had incurred.” The shooting of the constable by one of the conspirators, in the prosecution of such common purpose, was an act which was or ought to have been known to be a probable consequence of prosecuting such purpose, and each of the conspirators became, under Cr. Code sec. 69(2), a party to the homicide. R. v. Rice (1902), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 509.

Constructive murder, as it is called, is a phrase which has no legal meaning, but is a common and convenient way of describing a homicide committed under circumstances which in law constitutes the offence of murder, though the particular act which occasioned it may not have been actually done or directly authorised by the accused. R. v. Rice (1902), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 509, per Osler, J.A.

Manslaughter.—Where a person strikes another wantonly and unlawfully, but without any intention of doing him bodily harm, and thereby caused the other to fall and dislocate his spine, and death results therefrom, the assaulting party is guilty of manslaughter, although death would not ordinarily result either from the blow or from the fall. R. v. Chisholm, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 15.

Sec. 1.—Of Manslaughter.

Culpable Homicide, which would Otherwise be Murder, may be Reduced to Manslaughter by Provocation.—Code sec. 261.

Culpable Homicide not Amounting to Murder is Manslaughter.—Code sec. 262.

Neglect to Guard Hole in Unused Ice or Mine.—Code sec. 287.

Punishment for Manslaughter.—Code sec. 268.

Provocation.—See Notes to Part 1, sec. 6.

Accessories.—See Notes to Bk. 1, ch. 5.

Corporations Cannot be Guilty of Manslaughter.—(See preceding note on Criminal Liability of Corporations.)

Resistance to Officers of Justice.—(1) The question whether a peace officer, on reasonable and probable grounds, believed that an offence for which the offender might be arrested without a warrant had been committed by the fugitive fleeing to escape arrest, is one for the jury, and not for the Judge to decide.

(2) If a person with intent to steal something out of a shop or store, opens a door leading into it by lifting the latch or turning the knob and then enters the store, although during business hours, for the purpose of carrying out his intention, he may be convicted of shopbreaking under sec. 461 of the Code.

(3) When a peace officer, pursuing a fugitive, whom he had a right to arrest without a warrant, found that the fugitive was, in his opinion, likely to escape for the time being owing to superior speed, it is a question for the jury, on the trial of the officer for manslaughter in killing the fugitive by a shot from his revolver, intended only to wound and so stop his flight, whether, under all the circumstances, the officer was justified under section 41 of the Code in such shooting in order to prevent the escape of such fugitive, or whether such escape could not have been prevented by reasonable means in a less violent way. R. v. Smith, 17 Man. R. 282, 13 Can. Cr. Cas. 326.

Lawful Acts Improperly Performed.—On a charge of manslaughter against the master of a ship in respect of a collision resulting in loss of life, such recklessness must appear as will amount to a wilful attempt upon the lives of people in putting them to danger, and not merely an error of judgment. R. v. Delisle (1896), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 210 (Que.).

Striking a person unlawfully, but without intention to do him bodily harm, is manslaughter, if the act results in death. R. v. Chisholm, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 15.

Sec. 1.—Indictment.

Where two persons are jointly indicted for murder and one pleads guilty, and the other not guilty, and the trial upon the latter plea results in an acquittal, leave should be granted the other defendant to change his plea of guilty to one of not guilty, if the circumstances of the case are such that the verdict of acquittal already given in respect of the one would be absolutely inconsistent with the guilt of the other who had pleaded guilty. The King v. Herbert, 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 214.

In a criminal trial as in a civil case, only the issues presented by the evidence need be submitted to the jury.

On a trial for murder by shooting, where the evidence for the prosecution was of a deliberate shooting, and the accused giving evidence on his own behalf claimed that the shooting was accidental, and there was no evidence of provocation, a verdict of guilty will not be set aside on the ground that the trial Judge withdrew from the jury the question of manslaughter by instructing them that their verdict on the evidence must be one of either guilty of murder or one of acquittal. The King v. Barrett, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 464.

Sec. 4.—Conviction of Offences not Specifically Charged.

When only Part Proved of Offence Charged.—Code sec. 951.

Conviction of Manslaughter on Charge of Murder.—Code sec. 951(2).

Indictment for Same Offence with Averment of Intention after Previous Acquittal.—Code sec. 909(1).

Previous Conviction, or Acquittal, Effect of.—Code sec. 909(2).

An acquittal on a charge of manslaughter is not a bar to a charge of inflicting bodily harm based upon the same circumstances. R. v. Shea, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. pt. 3, page 319.

It is not necessary that the lesser offence should be expressly charged on the face of the indictment. It will be sufficient if the charge must of necessity include it. Per Richards, C.J., R. v. Smith (1874), 34 U.C.Q.B. 552, following R. v. Bird (1850), 5 Cox C.C. 1; 2 Den. C.C. 94.

On an indictment for murder in the statutory form, the prisoner, under 32-33 Vict. ch. 29, sec. 51 (Canada), cannot be convicted of an assault, and his acquittal of the felony is, therefore, no bar to a subsequent indictment for the assault, R. v. Smith, 34 U.C.Q.B. 552; R. v. Ganes, 22 U.C.C.P. 185; R. v. Dingman, 22 U.C.Q.B. 283.

Upon an indictment for shooting with felonious intent, the prisoner if acquitted of the felony, may be convicted of common assault. R. v. Cronan, 24 U.C.C.P. 106.

An acquittal on a charge of manslaughter is not a bar to a charge of inflicting bodily harm based upon the same circumstances. The King v. Shea, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 319.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

OF PROCURING OR ATTEMPTING ABORTION.

AN infant in its mother's womb, not being in rerum natura, is not considered as a person who can be killed within the description of murder (a). But an unsuccessful attempt to effect the destruction of such an infant appears to have been treated as a misdemeanor at common law (b). As to the liability for killing the mother by attempts to procure miscarriage or causing by such attempts the death of the child after actual birth, vide ante, p. 663.

By the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 58 (c), 'Every woman, being with child, who, with intent to procure her own miscarriage (d), shall unlawfully administer to herself any poison or other noxious thing, or shall unlawfully use any instrument or other means whatsoever with the like intent, and whosoever, with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she be or be not with child, shall unlawfully (e) administer to her or cause to be taken by her any poison or other noxious thing (f), or shall unlawfully (g) use any instrument or other means whatsoever with the like intent, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . .' (gg).

Sect. 59 (h), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully supply or procure any poison or other noxious thing, or any instrument or thing whatsoever, knowing that the same is intended to be unlawfully used or employed with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she be or be not with child, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and

(a) Ante, p. 663.

(b) 1 Hawk. c. 3, s. 13. 3 Co. Inst. 51. See a precedent of an indictment for this offence as a misdemeanor at common law in 3 Chit. Cr. L. 798, procured from the Crown Office, Mich. T. 42 Geo. III.

(c) Framed on 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 6, with the additions indicated by italics. The second part in terms makes it immaterial whether the woman were or were not with child, in accordance with the decision in R. v. Goodhall, 1 Den. 187, or R. v. Goodchild, 2 C. & K. 293.

(d) See Taylor, Med. Jurisprudence (5th ed.), ii. 149.

(e) The word 'maliciously' was in 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 13.

(f) The words of 43 Geo. III. c. 58, in s. 1, were 'any deadly poison or other noxious and destructive substance or thing'; in s. 2, 'any medicines, drug or other substance or thing whatsoever. The words in 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, where the woman was quick with child, were, 'any poison or other noxious thing.' Where the woman was not quick with child, 'any medicine or other thing.' See note (o), post, p. 830.

(g) 'Unlawfully' was not in 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 13.

(gg) Or for not less than three years, or to be imprisoned with or without hard labour for not more than two years. 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1. Ante, pp. 211, 212. The words omitted were repealed in 1892 (S. L. R.).

(h) This section was new in 1861, and intended to check the obtaining of poison, &c., for the purpose of causing abortion.

being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . (i) to be kept in penal servitude.

The word 'unlawfully' excludes from the section acts done in the course of proper treatment in the interest of the life or health of the mother (j).

In the case of an indictment against the mother under sect. 58 it is necessary to prove that she was with child, but not that she was quick with child (k), and in the case of any other person, it is immaterial whether the woman were or were not with child.

On an indictment against a woman for being present aiding and abetting the use of an instrument upon her to commit an offence against sect. 58, it was held that the woman was properly convicted on proof that she consented to the use of the instrument with the intent, &c., and that she was with child though the indictment did not allege that she was with child (l). Apparently the mother could be found guilty of aiding and abetting an offence under the second part of the section even if she was not with child (m).

Where a woman, being with child, with intent to procure abortion, takes a thing which she believes to be noxious, but which is, in fact, harmless, she may be convicted of an attempt to commit an offence within sect. 58 (n).

Drugs.—An indictment upon 43 Geo. III. c. 58, s. 2, (rep.) charged the prisoner with having administered to a woman a decoction of a certain shrub called savin: and it appeared upon the evidence that the prisoner prepared the medicine which he administered by pouring boiling water on the leaves of a shrub. The medical men who were examined stated that such a preparation is called an infusion, and not a decoction (which is made by boiling the substance in the water), upon which the prisoner's counsel insisted that he was entitled to an acquittal, on the ground that the medicine was misdescribed. But Lawrence, J., overruled the objection, and said, that infusion and decoction are ejusdem generis, and that the variance was immaterial (o).

(i) The words omitted were repealed in 1892 (S. L. R.). The present punishment under 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1 is penal servitude for not more than five nor less than three years, or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not more than two years. Vide ante, pp. 211, 212.

(k) The repealed enactments 43 Geo. III. c. 58 and 9 Geo. IV. c. 31 drew a distinction between cases in which a woman was quick with child and cases where she was not, even if she believed herself to be so. R. v. Scudder, 1 Mood. 216. On this subject see R. v. Phillips, 3 Camp. 77. In R. v. Wycherley, 8 C. & P. 262, where a jury of matrons was empanelled to determine whether a woman convicted of murder was quick with child, it was ruled that quick with child meant pregnant. (o) He added that the question was whether the prisoner administered any matter or thing to the woman to procure abortion. R. v. Phillips, 3 Camp. 74. In R. v. Coe, 6 C. & P. 403, where the prisoner was indicted on 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 13, for administering saffron to a female, and his counsel was cross-examining her as to her having taken something else before the saffron, and also as to the innocuous nature of the article; Vaughan, B., said: 'Does that signify? It is with the intention that the jury have to do; and if the prisoner administered a bit of bread merely with intent to procure abortion, it is sufficient.' It is not stated upon which branch of the section this indictment was framed; if upon the latter, which used the words 'any medicine or other thing,'

On an indictment for administering feverfew and other drugs to procure abortion, it appeared that the prisoner gave the woman, who was alleged to be with child by him, two powders, with directions to take one on each of two successive nights, and said that the effect would be to cause miscarriage. She took one of the powders, with the feverfew, which brought on violent sickness. The other powder was examined by a physician, and he could not discover any mineral substance in it; as far as he could judge from the taste, smell, and appearance, it was a mixture of savin and fenugreek, the latter being the larger ingredient. The fenugreek would scarcely produce any effect at all; savin, in that quantity, might produce a little disturbance in the stomach for the time, but would do no further injury. Feverfew (p) is an herb very similar to camomile: it is a tonic in common use among the peasantry, and has nothing noxious in it. A mixture of the powder and decoction of this herb would not alter the properties of either. The prisoner upon two or three subsequent occasions had brought the woman other medicines to take for the same purpose, some of which she had taken, but not the rest. Wilde, C. J., held that the evidence was not sufficient to prove that the drugs administered came within the meaning of the words 'poison or other noxious thing' (q).

Where the prisoner caused half an ounce of oil of juniper to be administered, and it was proved that quantities considerably less may be taken without any ill effect, but that half an ounce produces ill effects and is dangerous to a pregnant woman, it was held that there was evidence of the administering of a 'noxious thing' within the section (r).

In order to bring a case within sect. 59 of the Act of 1861, it is not necessary that the intention of using the noxious substance should exist in the mind of any other person than the person supplying it. In R. v. Hillman (s), perhaps the dictum was right. But neither this dictum, nor that of Lawrence, J., in R. v. Phillips, apply to s. 58, supra, which uses the words 'any poison or other noxious thing' only in the case of administering or causing to be taken; and although a doubt is suggested in a note to R. v. Coe as to whether the words 'other means' might not be applied to other substances than such as are poisonous or noxious; it would seem that the words 'other means whatsoever' cannot be so applied in s. 58: firstly, because they are in an entirely distinct sentence; secondly, because they are governed by the word 'use,' and not by 'administer.' C. S. G. See Rosc. Cr. Evid. (13th ed.), 232.

(p) Or Featherfew Matricaria, so called from its supposed use in disorders of the womb.

(q) R. v. Perry, 2 Cox, 223. Wilde, C.J., also held that the other transactions were admissible as showing the intent with which the particular drugs referred to in the indictment were administered. See post, Vol. ii. p. 2108 et seq. As the prisoner administered the drugs with intent to procure a miscarriage, and as savin is unquestionably in its nature a noxious drug, the decision in this case seems open to grave doubt. It is submitted that the true meaning of the words 'poison or other noxious thing' is such things as in their nature are poisonous or noxious; and that it is a misapprehension to suppose that the statute requires such a quantity of a poison or other noxious thing to be administered as shall be noxious. If a person administers any quantity of a poison, however small, it has never yet been doubted, that, if it were done with intent to murder, the offence of administering poison with intent to murder was complete; and R. v. Cluderay, 1 Den. 514, shews that if poison be administered in such a way that it cannot injure, the offence is nevertheless complete. Wilde, C.J., there said: 'The act of administering poison with intent to kill is proved. The effect of that act is beside the question.' It is submitted, therefore, that if there be an intent to procure abortion, it is quite immaterial how small the quantity be of the poison or other noxious thing that is administered.' C. S. G.

the prisoner was indicted for supplying savin, knowing that it was intended to be unlawfully used to procure a miscarriage, and it was contended that there was no case against him, because it was necessary that he should know that the savin was intended to be used with intent to procure the miscarriage, whereas it was not intended, except by the prisoner himself, to be so used; the jury found that the case was in other respects proved, but that the prosecutrix did not intend to take the savin, nor did any other person, except the prisoner, intend that she should take it. Upon a case reserved, it was held that the intention of any other person than the prisoner was not necessary to the commission of the offence. The statute is directed against the supplying of any substance with the intention that it shall be employed in procuring abortion. The prisoner, in this case, supplied the substance, and intended that it should be employed to procure abortion. He knew of his own intention that it should be so employed, and was therefore within the words of the statute. He was also within the mischief of the statute, and was rightly convicted.

In R. v. Titley (t), on an indictment under sect. 59, it appeared that the defendant supplied a mixture of ergot of rye and perchloride of iron with intent that it should be used by a certain woman to produce abortion (u). It was ruled that the defendant was liable, although the woman for whom it was intended was not pregnant, and that the enactment applied 'whether there is a woman in a state fit to be the subject of the operation or not' (v).

The thing supplied with intent to procure abortion must be noxious in its nature, 'according to the form, quality, or frequency with which it is administered' (w). Where, therefore, an indictment charged the prisoner with supplying a certain noxious thing with intent to procure abortion, and a surgeon proved that the liquid was some vegetable decoction of a harmless character, and such as would not procure a miscarriage; but if taken with the belief that it would produce it, it might, by acting on the imagination, produce that effect; it was held that this liquid was not within the clause, although the woman proved that, after taking a wine-glassful, she felt dizzy in the head when she went to bed, and felt stupid in the head the next morning (x).

But it need not be shewn what the noxious thing is; it is sufficient if something is administered that produces miscarriage (y).

To constitute an administering, or causing to be taken, it is not necessary that there should be a delivery by the hand. Where, therefore, on an indictment for administering poison and causing poison to be taken, it appeared that the prisoner had mixed poison with coffee, and had told her mistress that the coffee was for her, and the mistress took it, and drank some of it; it was held that this was sufficient (z). In R. v. Cadman (a), a mere delivery to the woman, however, was held insufficient, and it was said that the poison must be taken into the mouth to constitute an administering. But in R. v. Walford (b), it was held unnecessary for proving administration to shew that the poison had been taken into the stomach.

Upon an indictment for unlawfully administering to, and causing to be taken by, C., poison, with intent to procure her miscarriage, it appeared that she, being and believing herself to be pregnant, applied to the prisoner to get her something to procure her miscarriage, and that the prisoner accordingly purchased some preparation of mercury, which he gave to her, directing her to take one half of the quantity in gin; C. accordingly procured the gin, and, in the absence of the prisoner, took the dose, which produced a miscarriage. The jury found these facts, and that the mercury was both given by the prisoner to C., and taken by her, with intent to procure the miscarriage; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the prisoner was properly convicted; as there was a 'causing to be taken' within the meaning of the statute (c). So where on a similar indictment it appeared that the prisoner had talked with C. about her being with child, and brought her a bunch of savin, and told her, if she put it in some gin, and took from half a glass to a glass two or three times a week, it would destroy her child, and she took the savin and gin three or four times accordingly; and the prisoner afterwards induced C. to get some blue pills from a chemist, which the prisoner made up with some flour and tea into pills, of which C. took twenty or thirty, and was very ill from the time of taking the pills till she was confined; it was held, upon a case reserved, that there was no distinction between this and the preceding case (d).

Under the Act of 1861, in such cases as the two last, the woman being with child would be a principal, and the man an accessory before the fact; but where the woman is not with child these cases will still apply; for there the woman's criminality will be exactly the same as it was under the former Act.

On an indictment for administering savin with intent to procure abortion, the administration of savin on one day was proved, and it was proposed on the part of the prosecution to prove the administration of similar drugs on many subsequent days for the purpose of shewing the intent, and also as part of the same felony, and it was urged that the substance of the felony was the administration of drugs for the purpose of procuring abortion, and if that were done by homœopathic doses, taken for a long period, all would form part of one felony; but Cresswell, J., held that other matters of the same description might be proved for the purpose of shewing the intent, but that the administration of distinguishes the case from R. v. Williams, 1 Den. 39.

(d) R. v. Farrow, D. & B. 164. It is not stated expressly whether the savin and pills were taken in the absence of the prisoner, but the inference from the facts stated is that they were. See also R. v. Gaylor, D. & B. 288. R. v. Fretwell, L. & C. 161.

other savin on other days could not be given in evidence as part of the offence (e).

Instruments or other Means:—The decisions on criminal use of instruments within sects. 58, 59, are to be found in medical rather than in legal treatises (f).

In R. v. Dale (g), where an instrument or appliance is used which might be properly employed for innocent treatment of the woman, Charles, J., ruled that evidence that the accused had by similar means caused or attempted to cause miscarriages was admissible to prove that the act was done with a guilty intent. In R. v. Bond (h), it was pointed out that the evidence was not in fact admitted; and that it would not be admissible when the only question at issue was whether the instrument was in fact used (i). But in that case, after full discussion, it was held by the majority of the Court (j), that on an indictment under sect. 58 against a medical man, to shew guilty intention, evidence might be admitted to prove the use by him of instruments with the avowed intention of producing the miscarriage of another woman, and of his then using expressions indicating that he was in the habit of performing similar operations for the same illegal purpose.

As to advertisements, &c., inciting to or advising the procuring of miscarriage, see ante, p. 203, note (c).

A woman who wrongly believing herself to be with child conspires with others to procure her miscarriage is liable to conviction for criminal conspiracy (k).

Evidence.—As to the medical aspects of the evidence see Taylor, Med. Jurisp. (5th ed.), ii. 180. Dying declarations are not admissible on indictments for offences within this chapter (l). A statement made before her death by the woman operated upon, tendered in evidence on an indictment under sect. 58, was rejected on the ground that though made in the presence and hearing of the accused, he had not a sufficient opportunity of explaining or denying it (m).

Where the woman with respect to whom an offence against sects. 58, 59 is alleged to have been committed or attempted is a witness for the Crown, her evidence requires corroboration as that of an accomplice (n), in a material particular implicating the accused (o). But this rule does not apply where the woman has acted as a police spy with a view to detect an abortionist (p).

The statute 32-33 Vict. ch. 20, sec. 59, as well as the later Act R.S.C. 1886, ch. 162, sec. 47, used the phrase “any poison or other noxious thing.” It was laid down under that statute that while poisons are not noxious things when taken as medicine in ordinary treatment, that if taken or administered in undue and immoderate quantities the excess of the article becomes noxious, and it is not essential to support a conviction that the article should be noxious in itself. *R. v. CHAPTER THE THIRD.

OF CONSPIRACY, INCITEMENT AND ATTEMPTS TO MURDER : AND OF WOUNDING AND CAUSING GRIEVOUS BODILY HARM.

SECT. I.—OF CONSPIRACY AND INCITEMENT TO MURDER.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 4 (a), ' All persons who shall conspire, confederate, and agree to murder any person, whether he be a subject of His Majesty or not, and whether he be within the King's dominions or not, and whosoever shall solicit, encourage, persuade, or endeavour to persuade, or shall propose to any person, to murder any other person, whether he be a subject of His Majesty or not, and whether he be within the King's dominions or not, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not more than ten years . . . (b).

As regards conspiracy or incitement to murder within the realm or within the Admiralty jurisdiction, this enactment does no more than prescribe the punishment for an offence already recognised by the common law.

In R. v. Macdaniel (c), a number of persons, in order to procure rewards offered by Acts of Parliament for apprehending highway robbers, concocted a false charge of robbery against one Kidden, who was convicted and executed for it upon the evidence of two of the conspirators. Macdaniel and others were first tried and convicted on an indictment for conspiring to procure Kelly and Ellis to go to Deptford, in Kent, and there take money from Salmon on the King's highway, who should be waiting there for that purpose, with intent to cause Kelly and Ellis to be apprehended and convicted of highway robbery from Salmon, and so unjustly and wickedly to procure to themselves the rewards (d). Macdaniel and Berry were also indicted and convicted for the wilful murder of one Kidden, in maliciously causing him to be unjustly apprehended, falsely accused, tried, convicted, and executed, well knowing him to be innocent, and with intent to share the reward (e). On this indictment a verdict of guilty was returned, but judgment was respited to allow a motion in arrest of judgment, and the law officers declined to argue the point and the prisoners were discharged on that indictment (f).

(a) In Ireland, under 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, ss. 8, 9, the offences mentioned in this section were capital felonies; and in the Bill, as it passed the House of Lords, the offences were continued as felonies, but made punishable by penal servitude for life; the House of Commons, however, altered them to misdemeanors, punishable with ten years' penal servitude, and as all the offences specified in this clause appear to be misdemeanors at common law the effect of this clause is merely to alter the punishment.

(b) The words omitted were repealed in 1892 (S. L. R.), as superseded by 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212, under which the minimum term of penal servitude is three years and imprisonment with or without hard labour for not more than two years may be awarded.

Conspiracy.—The words ‘whether he be a subject of His Majesty or not, and whether he be within the King’s dominions or not,’ were introduced in order to make it perfectly clear that sect. 4 included cases where the conspiracy was to murder a foreigner in a foreign country (g).

It is not essential that the conspiracy should have been formed in England or Ireland. The Act, by sect. 68 (h) includes conspiracies within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England or Ireland; and even if that section did not exist, British subjects who conspire on the high seas are triable according to the course of the common law in any county in England where any act in furtherance of such conspiracy is done by any one of them, or by their innocent agent; for the crime of conspiracy, amounting only to a misdemeanor, may, like high treason, be tried wherever one distinct overt act of conspiracy is in fact committed (i).

Although at common law the criminal jurisdiction of counties was local (j), yet in conspiracy the jury could, as we have seen, at common law take cognisance of acts done on the high seas or in another county, provided there were an overt act done in the county where the indictment was preferred: and it would therefore seem that if there were a conspiracy on land abroad, a jury might try it in any place in England where any overt act in pursuance of it was done. Lastly, suppose A. in England

(f) 19 St. Tr. 813; vide ante, p. 679.

(g) And to do away with questions which had previously arisen see Y. B. (13 Edw. IV.), f. 9, pl. 5. The matter was much discussed in R. v. Bernard, 1 F. & F. 240; 8 St. Tr. (N. S.) 857, an indictment for conspiracy to murder the Emperor Napoleon III. Mr. Greaves’ view on the subject were as follows: ‘The words were introduced ex abundanti cautela only, and this section cannot be cited as a legislative declaration that a conspiracy in England to murder a foreigner in a foreign country is not a conspiracy indictable at common law, or that the killing of a foreigner in a foreign country, under such circumstances as would amount to murder if the killing were in England, is not murder in contemplation of the law of England. The introduction of the words in question makes it unnecessary to discuss either of those questions; but, having with no small care examined all the authorities to be found on the subject, I may be pardoned for saying it is perfectly clear to me that the killing of any person anywhere in the world, whether on land or sea, under such circumstances that if the killing had been in England it would have amounted to the crime of murder, has ever been murder in contemplation of the law of England. Wherever a murder has taken place in England or on the narrow seas, the Court of King’s Bench, or Courts of Oyer and Terminer or Gaol Delivery, have had jurisdiction to try it by a jury. Wherever a murder has taken place on the high seas, the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction to try it according to the civil law; and wherever a murder has taken place on land abroad, the Court of the Constable and Marshal had jurisdiction to try it according to the civil law. By sundry statutes in and since the time of Henry VIII. the jurisdiction to try murders committed on the high seas and on land abroad, has been conferred on certain tribunals with the aid of a jury; but none of these statutes either alters, or professes to alter, the nature of the offence; on the contrary, they all treat it as murder, and only provide a different mode of trial. The doubt which has arisen, and not unnaturally, seems to have sprung from supposing that, because the Common Law Courts, trying all offences by the aid of a jury, had only jurisdiction over offences committed in England or on the narrow seas, therefore murder and other offences against the law of nature and nations were no offences at all in the eye of the law of England. The answer is, that the Courts of Admiralty and of the Constable and Marshal did try such offences from the earliest times; and, therefore, it is clear that they always were offences in the eye of the law of England.’ See Greaves, Crim. L. Cons. Acts (2nd ed.) 34.

conspired with B. abroad to commit a murder, and A. did some overt act in England, it would seem that both A. and B. might be tried in England, if B. was a British subject; and that if B. was not a British subject, A. might, nevertheless, be tried where he did that overt act; for such an act would be an act coupled with a criminal intent, and as such indictable, within the principle laid down in R. v. Higgins (k), even if it should be objected that a conspiracy between A. in England and B., a foreigner, abroad, was not a conspiracy within the criminal law of England. And as a letter written and sent, but intercepted, is an overt act in treason (l); so a letter may be an overt act in conspiracy. The provisions of the section apply to the overt acts of aliens within the realm or within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England or Ireland (m).

If a question should be raised whether, if one of the conspirators were to commit the murder, and the others were indicted as accessories before the fact, it might not be objected that they could only be tried for a misdemeanor under this clause; the answers are, first, that this clause has only altered the punishment, and created no new offence; and at common law the power to prosecute for a misdemeanor was not only never suggested as in any way preventing a prosecution for felony, but the best authorities always held that the misdemeanor merged in the felony. But, secondly, nothing can be clearer than that if a statute create a misdemeanor, and something be done in pursuance of, and in addition to, that misdemeanor, which amounts to a felony, all persons who have done acts which would make them accessories before the fact to that felony, may be indicted as such (putting aside merger altogether), on the plain ground that they are totally different offences. It has never been suggested, that because wounding with intent to murder is made a felony, therefore a man who killed another by wounding him could not be indicted for murder. There is no such thing as merger of one felony by another; and when, as is often the case, the same acts constitute several felonies, either at common law or by statute, the prosecutor may indict for any of them (n). Thus, in cases of real murder, indictments for manslaughter have often been preferred, and so also indictments for administering poison where death has ensued.

Where on an indictment against three prisoners and others unknown, for a conspiracy to murder, one of them was tried first, because they severed in their challenges, and the evidence tended to affect him and the others named in the indictment, and made a case to go to the jury as to a conspiracy by the three: but there was no evidence to shew that any other person was engaged in the conspiracy: and the jury found the prisoner guilty, and on his being brought up for judgment it was objected that the prisoner ought not by law to have been tried alone. The objection was overruled and sentence passed. Upon a case reserved, it was contended that the judgment was irregular: for if the others were acquitted, the prisoner could not be guilty of conspiracy: that there was a contradiction on the face of the record, for the others had not been found guilty, and until they were his guilt was not proved: and that the judgment ought to have been respited. But it was held that there were no grounds for respiting or arresting judgment (o).

Incitement to Murder.—Upon an indictment for soliciting A. to murder C., the evidence was that the prisoner gave poison to A. to administer to C., and which A. accordingly did; but C. having taken part of it, discovered the fact in time to save his life. The jury found him guilty, believing that the poison had been delivered to C. with intent to poison him, and that the solicitation was to that effect; the judges held both indictment and conviction proper, in treating the prisoner as a principal soliciting, and not as an accessory before the fact (p).

In R. v. Most (q), an indictment under the above section for encouraging and endeavouring to persuade others to commit murder, the alleged encouragement and endeavour to persuade to murder was the publication and circulation by him of an article written in German in a newspaper published in London exulting in the recent murder of the Emperor of Russia, and commending it as an example. The jury were directed that if they thought he intended to, and did, encourage any person to murder any other person, whether a subject of Her Majesty or not, and whether within her dominions or not, and that such encouragement was the natural effect of the article, they should find him guilty. It was held that such direction was correct, although the encouragement was not addressed to any person in particular.

It is not necessary to prove that the mind of the person solicited was affected by the solicitation (r).

In R. v. Antonelli (s), the indictment contained counts against A., for encouraging and endeavouring to persuade persons unknown to murder certain persons, to wit, sovereigns and rulers of Europe, 'not then being within the dominions of our Lord the King, and not being subjects of our said Lord the King,' and against B.; and also a count for encouraging and endeavouring to persuade persons unknown to murder Victor

(o) R. v. Ahearne, 6 Cox, 6, relying on R. v. Cooke, 5 B. & C. 538. 'It has always appeared to me perfectly clear that even if on a subsequent trial the others were acquitted, it would in no way affect the previous verdict or judgment. The jury who convict a prisoner who is tried alone for conspiracy, must have been satisfied both that he conspired with the other, and that the other conspired with him, and the subsequent acquittal is in no respect necessarily inconsistent with that verdict; for it may have proceeded on the want or failure of evidence. Suppose a defendant pleaded guilty, or was convicted on his own written confession, it might well be that the person with whom he had admitted he had conspired might be acquitted, and it would be absurd that he should thereby be exonerated. It is a fallacy to suppose that there is any inconsistency on the face of a record containing an indictment, verdict, and judgment, where any state of facts can be suggested which is consistent with the statements in that record.' Emmanuel III., King of Italy. The counts were challenged as bad for indefiniteness. Phillimore, J., ruled that the sovereigns of Europe were a sufficiently definite class, but considered that the word 'rulers' was somewhat vague and would have been better left out. The incitement was contained in a pamphlet called 'L'Insurrezione,' published and put on sale by A., on the anniversary of the murder of King Humbert of Italy. Phillimore, J., ruled that so far as it merely contained invectives on foreign systems of government it was not criminal; but left the case to the jury as to whether the document incited persons to murder the sovereigns of Europe in general or the reigning King of Italy in particular. The jury were also directed that B., who was charged with abetting, was liable if he circulated the pamphlet knowing, or wilfully shutting his eyes to, what it contained.

In R. v. Fox (t), on an indictment for soliciting H. to murder K., it was proved that the defendant wrote and posted a letter addressed to H., in which he requested him to murder K.; but that letter by accident fell into the hands of a fourth person and never reached H. It was ruled that this evidence was insufficient to warrant a conviction on the grounds that the words solicit, encourage, persuade, or endeavour to persuade all involved actual communication with the person to be influenced.

In R. v. Krause (u) the defendant was indicted for soliciting, persuading and endeavouring to persuade B. to murder one Foster, and for attempting to solicit, &c., B. to murder F. The case for the prosecution rested on two letters alleged to have been sent by the defendant to B., in South Africa. There was no evidence that the letters reached B. It was ruled in accordance with R. v. Fox (supra) that to constitute the statutory offence there must be evidence that there must be some communication to the person said to have been solicited; but the case was left to the jury on the counts charging an attempt to commit the statutory offence (v).

Former Statutes.—5 Hen. IV. c. 5 (x) related to cutting tongues and putting out eyes. Sir John Coventry's Act (22 & 23 Car. II. c. 1) (y) made malicious maiming a capital felony. 9 Anne, c. 21 (c. 16, Ruffhead) made it a capital felony to attempt to kill, assault, wound, &c., a privy councillor. The Black Act (9 Geo. I. c. 22) made maliciously shooting at any person a capital offence. 26 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 1 punished the beating or wounding persons shipwrecked with intent to kill them, &c., or putting out false lights to bring a ship into danger. Lord Ellenborough's Act (43 Geo. III. c. 58) dealt (inter alia), with malicious shooting. These statutes were repealed in 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27), 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 31), and 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 120). The substituted provisions contained in those Acts were repealed in 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 95).

Present Law.—The existing statute law punishing attempts to murder is contained in sects. 11–15 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100) (z).

Poisoning, Wounding, &c., with Intent to Murder.—By sect. 11 (a), 'Whosoever shall administer to or cause to be administered to or (b) to be taken by any person any poison or other destructive thing, or shall by any means whatsoever (c) wound (d) or cause any grievous bodily harm (e) to any person, with intent in any of the cases aforesaid to commit murder, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . (f)'.
 (x) Repealed in 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27).

Use of Explosives with Like Intent.—By sect. 12 (g), 'Whosoever, by the explosion of gunpowder or other explosive substance, shall destroy or damage any building, with intent to commit murder, shall be guilty of

c. 5, and 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 1, though repealed in England, seem still to be in force as common law in America; but generally speaking some State statute is substituted for the old English statutes. See Bishop, ii. ss. 1002, 1003, 1004.

(d) 'Wound' was inserted as a general term including every 'stab' or 'cut.' All that is now necessary to allege in the indictment is, that the prisoner did wound the prosecutor; and that allegation will be proved by any wound, whether it be a stab, cut, or other wound. The words 'any grievous bodily harm' are inserted instead of 'any bodily injury dangerous to life,' in order to render the clause more comprehensive. If in any case it be doubtful whether the facts bring it within this clause, but there is evidence that the acts were done with intent to murder, a count on s. 15, post, p. 841, alleging an attempt to murder, should be added.

(p) 'This section, which was new law in 1861, is meant to include every attempt to murder not specified in any preceding section. It therefore embraces all those atrocious cases where the ropes, chains, or machinery used in lowering miners into mines have been injured with intent that they may break and precipitate the miners to the bottom of the pit. So also all cases where steam engines are injured, set on work, stopped, or anything put into them, in order to kill any person, will fall within it. So also cases of sending or placing infernal machines with intent to murder. See R. v. Mountford, 1 Mood. 441, 7 C. & P. 242. Indeed every attempt to murder, which perverted ingenuity may devise, or fiendish malignity suggest, will fall within some clause of this Act, and may be visited with penal servitude for life. In any case where there may be a doubt whether the attempt falls within the terms of any of the preceding sections, a count framed on this clause should be added.' C. S. G.

sections is the same, and the effect of all could have been obtained by omitting the words "other than . . . to Act," in sect. 15. Sect. 15 cannot be used to punish attempts specified in sects. 11-14.

Letters Threatening to Murder.—Sect. 16, which punishes written threats to murder, is dealt with under the title 'Threats' post, Vol. II. p. 1161.

Impeding Escape from Wrecks.—By sect. 17 (r), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously prevent or impede any person, being on board of or having quitted any ship or vessel which shall be in distress, or wrecked, stranded, or cast on shore, in his endeavour to save his life, or shall unlawfully and maliciously prevent or impede any person in his endeavour to save the life of any such person as in this section first aforesaid, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life' . . . (rr).

Shooting or Attempting to Discharge Loaded Arms.—By sect. 19, 'Any gun, pistol, or other arms which shall be loaded in the barrel with gunpowder or any other explosive substance, and ball, shot, slug, or other destructive material, shall be deemed to be loaded arms within the meaning of this Act, although the attempt to discharge the same may fail from want of proper priming or from any other cause' (s). In sects. 14, 18 (post, p. 853), and 19, the word 'arms' clearly means 'fire arms' (t).

The words 'any other cause' in this section appear to cover not only defects in the loading, &c., but also prevention by the acts of a bystander, or of the person attacked. R. v. St. George (u), in which it was held that a man was not guilty of an attempt to discharge a loaded pistol which he had drawn, because it was snatched from his hand, was overruled in R. v. Duckworth (v), where it was held that where a man pulled out a loaded revolver and tried to fire it, but was forcibly prevented by the bystanders, he had committed an offence within sect. 14.

In R. v. Lewis (w), an acquittal was directed where the weapon was not in a condition to be discharged.

In R. v. Jackson (x), an attempt to fire a revolver loaded in six chambers was held to be an offence within sect. 14, though it failed because the hammer fell over a chamber containing an empty cartridge case. In (r) Taken from 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 89, s. 7. The words 'unlawfully and maliciously' are substituted for 'by force' in the former Act. Under 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 89, s. 7, if A. were pulling B. out of the water, and C. prevented A. from doing so, C. would have been guilty of no offence except an assault. The words in italics were introduced to meet this and similar cases. C. S. G.

(rr) For other punishments see 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212. The words omitted were repealed in 1892.

(s) This section was new law in 1861, and was intended to meet every case where a prisoner attempts to discharge a gun, &c., loaded in the barrel, but which misses fire for want of priming, or of a copper cap, or from any like cause. In R. v. Gamble, 10 Cox, 545, the attention of the Court does not seem to have been called to this section.

(t) Under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 11, a tin box filled with gunpowder and peas was held not to be a loaded arm. R. v. Mountford, 1 Mood. 441; 7 C. & P. 242. But to discharge the barrel of a gun when separated from the stock by striking the percussion cap with a knife was held to be shooting. R. v. Coates, R. & R. 394 and MSS. C. S. G. Patteson, J., consulted several other judges who agreed with him in opinion, otherwise the point would have been reserved.

(x) 17 Cox, 104, Charles, J.

R. v. Jones (y), it was held to be such attempt to pull the trigger of a central fire revolver loaded with rim-fire cartridges.

In R. v. Kitchen (z), where the prisoner was indicted under 43 Geo. III. c. 58 (rep.) for shooting at the prosecutor with a loaded pistol, Le Blanc, J., told the jury, that if it was loaded with powder and paper only, but fired so near, and in such a direction, that it would probably kill or do other grievous bodily harm, and with intent that it should do so, the case was within the Act. The jury convicted, saying, they were satisfied that the pistol was loaded with some other destructive material besides powder and paper. There was a petition to the Crown, on the ground that the pistol was loaded with powder and paper only. On a case reserved the judges held this direction to be right.

In R. v. Whiteley (a), where a similar indictment, under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 11 (rep.), in different counts, alleged a gun to have been loaded with shot and various destructive materials, and it appeared that a watcher of game being out in the night, saw the prisoner crouching under a wall, and said he knew him, when he instantly raised a gun to his shoulder, and levelled it at him; he stooped to avoid it, the gun went off, and the charge, whatever it was, struck a hairy cap he had on his head, and singed the hair. There was evidence of previous ill-will, and the prisoner after his apprehension, had said, 'I did it, and I rued it the instant I pulled the trigger.' A small bag of shot was found in the prisoner's pocket after he was apprehended. It was objected that there was no evidence to shew that the gun was loaded with shot, or any of the destructive materials charged in the indictment, and Patteson, J., was strongly of opinion that the objection ought to prevail; and, after consulting Alderson, B., he directed an acquittal.

The law seems to be that if a man does any act (such as pulling out a loaded pistol and pointing it at a person, or fumbling with the trigger or struggling to get free when seized and using words clearly indicating his intention to use the weapon if he could (b)) from which a jury might infer that he intended to discharge it, he may be convicted under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 14, if his intent was to murder, or under sect. 18 (post, p. 853), if his intent was to do grievous bodily harm (c).

The prisoner was tried on an indictment under sects. 14 and 18, charging him with feloniously attempting to discharge a certain revolver loaded with gunpowder and leaden bullets, at one Houston, with the intent, as alleged in one count, to murder him, as alleged in another, to commit murder, and as alleged in a third, to do Houston grievous bodily harm. The indictment did not contain the words 'by drawing a trigger' nor did it specify any other manner in which the attempt was made. The prisoner was convicted on the third count. In the course of an interview the prisoner put his hand in his pocket and commenced to pull out something, which turned out to be a revolver loaded in five barrels. Before he could get it completely out, Houston sprang on him. The prisoner had by this time got the revolver out of his pocket. Houston and the prisoner struggled for a few minutes. During the struggle the prisoner said several times 'You've got to die.' Eventually Houston wrested the revolver from the prisoner. A case was reserved as to whether there was evidence of an attempt within sections 14 & 18. The Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Kennedy, Ridley, Darling and Walton, JJ.) upheld the conviction. Kennedy, J., added: 'It is, however, important to bear in mind that in cases under this section, there must be evidence both of an attempt to discharge the weapon and of an intent to do grievous bodily harm, and, although an attempt implies the intent, an intent does not necessarily imply an attempt. There may be cases which are very near the line as regards the attempt, although there is no doubt as to the intent. It is always necessary that the attempt should be evidenced by some overt act forming part of a series of acts which, if not interrupted, would end in the commission of the actual offence (d).'

Shooting at large.—On an indictment for shooting at a person unknown with intent to murder him, it appeared that the prisoner, being irritated at a crowd of boys, who were following him, discharged a loaded pistol among them, and thereby wounded a person who was passing along the street; there was nothing to shew any intent to shoot at any particular person, nor was the person injured one of those who were teasing him. Jervis, C.J., (Alderson, B., being present), said: 'I do not think that the charge contained in this indictment is proved; doubtless at common law, if the person wounded had been killed, it would have been murder: but this is an offence under the statute, and must be proved strictly in its very terms.' It was then proposed to amend the indictment, by charging the prisoner with an intent to murder in the words of 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 2. Jervis, C.J., said: 'That would no doubt be a good indictment after verdict under 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 20, being in the words of the statute; but it may be a question whether it would not be demurrable for generality. We think that if we amend, we ought to do it in such a manner as that the indictment shall not be in any way defective. The prisoner has pleaded, and he ought to have an opportunity of demurring, which now of course he cannot do. We must therefore refuse the application' (e).

The prisoner was indicted for shooting at L. with intent to do him grievous bodily harm. The prisoner had been assaulted and annoyed by several persons, among whom was L. These persons were standing together in a group of about fifteen, and the prisoner fired a pistol into the group, and L. received some severe shot wounds in the neck. The jury found that the prisoner did not aim at L., or at any one in particular,

(d) R. v. Linnaker, ante, p. 843.

(e) R. v. Lallement, 6 Cox, 204. Mr. Greaves on this case says: 'It is clear that after the amendment the jury might have been discharged under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 1, and the Court might then have given the prisoner leave to withdraw his plea and demur to the amended indictment. This case as to the general allegation being insufficient on demurrer, accords with my former note (Russell, Cr. and M. (6th ed.) iii. 691). I still venture to submit that it is extremely questionable whether the indictment would not be equally bad after verdict, and I doubt whether any case can occur where an indictment may not be so framed as to meet the facts, and avoid the necessity for such a count; for whenever it is possible to prove an intent to murder any person, it is plain a count may be framed to meet that case.'

but that he fired into the group, intending generally to do grievous bodily harm, and so unlawfully wounded. Upon a case reserved, it was held that he was rightly convicted of the felony (f).

Upon an indictment under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 12, for maliciously shooting at C., it appeared that the prisoner fired into a room of C.'s house where he supposed C. was; C. was in another part of the house, where he could not by possibility be reached by the shot. Gurney, B., suggested that a man could scarcely be said to be shot at who was not near the place where the gun was fired. R. v. Bailey (R. & R. 1) was then cited for the prosecution, where, on an indictment for shooting at H. T., who was wounded with grape-shot out of a gun fired at a ship in which he was, Lord Eldon told the jury that he was of opinion, that if they thought the guns were fired at the vessel, and those on board her generally, that the guns might be considered as shot at each individual on board her, and therefore at H. T., the person named in the indictment: Gurney, B., 'That case is perfectly distinguishable from the present; cannon-shot fired into a ship more or less endangers every individual in it; every part of the ship may be penetrated by cannon-shot; but that cannot be said of shot fired from a gun into a room where it is proved no individual then was' (g).

Where on an indictment for shooting at the prosecutor with intent to maim, &c., it appeared that the prisoner had at various times been annoyed by night by idle persons attempting to frighten him, and the prosecutor returning home by night, passed near the prisoner's house with a lantern; the prisoner, seeing the light, thought that his nightly visitors had again appeared, reached his gun, and fired in the direction of the light, and wounded the prosecutor in the face: Patteson, J., thought that the facts would hardly bear out the charge in the indictment (h).

Wound.—The word 'wound' was introduced in 1837 to obviate difficulties which arose in the construction of the words 'cut' and 'stab' in the Act of 1828; and in the Act of 1861 the latter words were advisedly omitted as being included in the word 'wound' (i). It is now immaterial by what means the wound is given, and the means need not be stated in the indictment (ii).

In Moriarty v. Brookes (j), Lord Lyndhurst said that the 'definition of a wound, in criminal cases, is an injury to the person, by which the skin is broken. If the skin is broken, and there was a bleeding, it is a wound.' In R. v. Withers (k), upon an indictment for cutting and wounding, with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoner threw a hammer at the prosecutor, and hit him over his right eye and nose, and made a wound on the eye, and by the side of the nose ; his head was very bloody ; the hammer was a blacksmith's finishing hammer ; one end of it round, and the surface flat, the other end sharp, to draw out with. Upon a case reserved, the judges were unanimously of opinion that the injury stated in the case amounted to a wound within the statute.

In R. v. Beckett (l), it appeared that the prisoner attacked the prosecutor with a butcher's knife, and, drawing him backwards, attempted to cut his throat. The prosecutor succeeded in warding off all hurt except what he described as a slight scratch on his throat, by lifting his two hands up to his throat, but in doing this his hands struck against the knife and were cut. Parke, B., said : ' A scratch is not a wound within the statute ; there must at least be a division of the external surface of the body ; the cuts on the hands are indeed wounds ; but it appears that they were inflicted by the prosecutor himself in the attempt to defend himself from the prisoner's attack ; those cuts, therefore, cannot be considered wounds inflicted by the prisoner with intent to murder or maim the prosecutor.'

In R. v. McLoughlin (m), a medical man stated that there was a slight abrasion of the skin, not exactly a wound, but an abrasion of the cuticle ; it did not penetrate farther than that ; the cuticle is the upper skin ; blood would issue, but in a different manner, if the whole skin was cut. Coleridge, J. (Bosanquet and Coltman, JJ., being present), told the jury : ' It is essential for you to be quite clear that a wound was inflicted. I am inclined to understand, and my learned brothers are of the same opinion, that if it is necessary to constitute a wound that the skin should be broken, it must be the whole skin ; and it is not sufficient to shew a separation of the cuticle only. You will, therefore, have to say on the first three counts whether there was a wounding in the sense in which I have stated, viz., was there a wound—a separation of the whole skin ?'

In R. v. Smith (n), a surgeon stated ' that the lower jaw on the left side was broken in two places ; the skin was broken internally, but not externally ; there was not a great deal of blood ; one fracture was near the chin, and the other near the ear.' The prisoner had struck the prosecutor with a hammer on the left side of the face, but there was no wound on the outside of the face. It was objected that this was not a wounding within 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 85. Park, J. said : ' When I first read the deposition I thought there might be some doubt. In consequence of this, I consulted with my Lord Chief Justice, and considered the question very much in my own mind, and we are of opinion that it is a wounding within the meaning of the Act.' Denman, C.J. : ' If it is the immediate effect of the injury, we think we cannot distinguish this from the cases which have been already decided.' Park, J., in summing up : ' A question was very properly put to us, as to whether we thought there was a wound within the meaning of the statute. We were of opinion that there was a wound ; and upon consideration, I am more strongly of that opinion than I was at the outset. There must be a wounding ; but if there was a wound (that is, if the skin is broken, whether there be an effusion of blood or not), it is within the statute, whether the wound is internal or external.'

In R. v. Jones (o), on an indictment for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner had given the prosecutrix a violent kick in the private parts, and that it had been followed by an occasional discharge of blood mingled with urine, but the surgeon could not say from what precise vessels the blood originally flowed. Patteson, J., held that the charge was not sustained; there might have been no lesion of any vessels at all; but the blood might have been discharged simply from natural causes.

In R. v. Waltham (p), on a similar indictment, it appeared that a policeman had received a violent kick on his private parts, and the external skin was unbroken, but the lining membrane of the urethra was ruptured, which caused a small flow of blood, mingled with urine, for two days. Cresswell, J., held that this case was very different from the preceding, and that there was a wounding within the statute.

In R. v. Warman (q), there was no external breach of the skin, but a collection of blood between the scalp and the cranium just above the spot where within the cranium there was an extravasation of blood pressing on the brain, and the surgeon called it a contused wound with effusion of blood. The internal part of the skin was broken. Medically the breaking of the skin, whether internally or externally, is a wound. It was held that this internal wound was a sufficient wound to support the allegation of a wound in an indictment for murder, whether it would have been so or not on an indictment on the statute for wounding with intent, &c.

In R. v. Sheard (r) it appeared that the prisoner struck the prosecutor with an air-gun twice on the left side of a thick hat that he had on his head. The prosecutor had a contused wound on the left side of his head, which was made by the hard rim of the prosecutor's hat, by the violence with which the hat was struck by the prisoner, and was not occasioned by the gun alone, as the prosecutor said the gun had never come directly in contact with his head. Upon a case reserved upon a doubt whether, as the wound must have in fact have been caused by the hat, and not by the gun barrel, the prisoner ought to have been convicted, the conviction was held right.

In R. v. Day (s), an indictment for wounding with intent to maim, &c., the prosecutor proved that he endeavoured to persuade the prisoner to leave a public-house, and that the prisoner knocked him over a form with his fists, in one of which he appeared to have some instrument; when the prosecutor recovered his legs, he put forth his hand to ward off the attack of the prisoner, and in so doing he pushed it against the right hand of the prisoner, in which was a penknife, which ran into the prosecutor's finger just deep enough to bring blood. The prisoner seemed to hold the knife in his hand, and to use it as if he was attempting to cut the frock of the prosecutor, and the frock bore three long marks as if it had been slit downwards by cuts from the knife, and there were several scars through which the knife had not penetrated. Parke, B., held that there was an end to the charge of felony, as the prosecutor's hand came in contact with the knife at a moment when no intention existed in the mind of the prisoner to inflict any wound on his person.

In R. v. Spooner (t), on an indictment for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner knocked the prosecutor down with a stick on a tram-road; and it was contended that the wound was caused by the fall on the iron trams. Talfourd, J., told the jury, that in order to convict the prisoner the wound must be direct, and if they should be of opinion that the injury was the result of a fall, although occasioned by a blow from the prisoner, that would not be sufficient.

Proof of Intent.—Upon an indictment for shooting, or wounding, or administering poison, &c., to another, with intent to murder him, or to do him some grievous bodily harm, 'whether the act was done by the prisoner, with the particular intention wherewith it is charged to have been done, is, as in other cases of specific malice and intention, a question for the jury. The inference upon this important point, as in other cases of malicious intention, must be founded upon a consideration of the situation of the parties, the conduct and declarations of the prisoner, and, above all, on the nature and extent of the violence and injurious means he has employed to effect his object. In estimating the prisoner's real intention, it is obviously of importance to consider the quantity and quality of the poison which he administered, the nature of the instrument used, and the part of the body on which the wound was inflicted, according to the plain and fundamental rule, that a man's motives and intentions are to be inferred from the means which he uses and the acts which he does. If, with a deadly weapon, he deliberately inflicts a wound upon a vital part, where such a wound would be likely to prove fatal, a strong inference results that his mind and intention were to destroy. It is not, however, essential to the drawing of such an inference, that the wound should have been inflicted on a part where it was likely to prove mortal; such a circumstance is merely a simple and natural indication of intention, and a prisoner may be found guilty of a cutting with an intention within the statute, although the wound was inflicted on a part where it could not have proved mortal, provided the criminal intention can be clearly inferred from other circumstances' (u).

Intent to Commit Murder.—The common element in sects. 11-15, is the 'intent to commit murder,' generally. Under the Act of 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 31), s. 11, it seems to have been necessary to allege an intent to murder a particular person, which caused difficulties in cases where poison meant for A. was taken by B., or a shot aimed at A. hit B. (v).

(u) R. v. Case, York. Sum. Ass. 1820, cited 2 Stark. Ev. (3rd ed.) 692, note (h), where Park, J., said that it had been so held by the judges. 'It is obvious that a case may fall both within the letter and the spirit of the statute, although from accident or from ignorance the prisoner has not succeeded in reaching a vital part.'—Note by Mr. Starkie.

(v) In R. v. Ryan, 2 M. & Rob. 213, Parke and Alderson, BB., declined to allow a conviction on an indictment for causing poison to be taken by G. on evidence that the poison was intended for G. but was taken by C., but directed a fresh indictment

It is generally considered that under the existing enactments a count alleging a general 'intent to commit murder' is good (w).

It is a very important question, whether on a count charging an intent to murder, it is essential that the jury should be satisfied that that intent existed in the mind of the prisoner at the time of the offence, or whether it is sufficient that it would have been a case of murder had death ensued (x); and this question does not seem to be completely settled. In R. v. Cruse (y), where a man was indicted for inflicting an injury dangerous to life on a child, with intent to murder it, and his wife as principal in the second degree, for aiding and abetting him, where it appeared that the prisoners had inflicted great violence on the child, Patteson, J., told the jury, 'Before you can find the prisoner, T. C., guilty of this felony, you must be satisfied that when he inflicted this violence on the child, he had in his mind a positive intention of murdering that child. Even if he did it under circumstances which would have amounted to murder if death had ensued, that will not be sufficient, unless he actually intended to commit murder. With respect to the wife, to be prepared alleging the intent to be to commit murder generally, upon which the defendant was convicted and sentenced. They doubted R. v. Lewis, 6 C. & P. 161, decided on 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 11, where Gurney, B., on a similar indictment and similar evidence had said: 'The question is, whether the prisoner laid this poison on the shop counter, intending to kill some one. If it was intended for Mrs. Daws, and finds its way to Mrs. Davis, and she takes it, the crime is as much within this Act of Parliament as if it had been intended for Mrs. Davis. If a person sends poison with intent to kill one person, and another person takes that poison, it is just the same as if it had been intended for such other person.'

(w) See Archb. Cr. Pl. (23rd ed.), 815. Mr. Greaves' note on the subject is as follows: 'Where a mistake of one person for another occurs, the cases of shooting, &c., may, perhaps, admit of a different consideration from the cases of poisoning. In the case of shooting at one person under the supposition that he is another, although there be a mistake, the prisoner must intend to murder that individual at whom he shoots; it is true he may be mistaken in fact as to the person, and that it may be owing to such mistake that he shoots at such person, but still he shoots with intent to kill that person. So in the case of cutting; a man may cut one person under a mistake that he is another person, but still he must intend to murder the man whose throat he cuts. In R. v. Mister, Salop Spr. Ass. 1841, cor. Gurney, B., the only count charging an intent to murder was the first, and that alleged the intent to be to murder Mackreth; and although on the evidence it was perfectly clear that Mister mistook Mackreth for Ludlow, whom he had followed for several days before, yet he was convicted and executed, and I believe the point never noticed at all. The case of poisoning one person by mistake for another, seems different, if the poison be taken in the absence of the prisoner; for in such case he can have no actual intent to injure that person. These difficulties, however, seem to be obviated by 1 Vict. c. 85 (see now 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 11), which instead of using the words 'with intent to murder such person,' have the words 'with intent to commit murder.' It may perhaps be doubted whether this alteration was not intended to enable the prosecutor to charge a shooting at one person with intent to murder another person; and doubts may perhaps be entertained, notwithstanding the very great weight due to any opinion of the judges in R. v. Ryan (supra), whether a count, stating a shooting with intent to commit murder, would not be bad on demurrer, and in arrest of judgment, for not stating the person intended to be murdered. It is true that it would follow the words of the Act; but in many cases that is not sufficient. Thus in R. v. Martin, 8 A. & E. 481, it was held that an indictment for obtaining goods by false pretences was bad on error, on the ground that it did not state that the goods obtained were the property of any person. In all cases of doubt as to the intention, it would be prudent to insert one count for shooting at A. with intent to murder him; another 'with intent to commit murder'; and a third for shooting at A. with intent to murder the person really intended to be killed; and if the party intended to be killed were unknown, a count for shooting at A. with intent to murder a person to the jurors unknown.

it is essential not only that she should have assisted her husband in the commission of the offence, but also that she should have known that it was her husband's intention to commit murder.' In R. v. Jones (2), where the first count charged the prisoner with shooting at Vaughan with intent to murder him, and the facts were such as only to amount to manslaughter, the same judge said, in summing up, 'It is a very important question, whether on a count charging an intent to murder, it is essential that the jury should be satisfied that that intent existed in the mind of the prisoner at the time of the offence, or whether it is sufficient that it would have been a case of murder if death had ensued. However, if it be necessary that the jury should be satisfied of the intent, I have no doubt that the circumstance, that it would have been a case of murder if death had ensued, would be of itself a good ground from which the jury might infer the intent, as every one must be taken to intend the necessary consequences of his own acts. In the present case, I think you may dismiss the first count from your consideration, as it would be very difficult to say, that if Mr. Vaughan had died, this would have been a case of murder.

Upon an indictment for feloniously wounding with intent to murder, disable, &c., it appeared that the prisoner, being confined in gaol, knocked the turnkey down by a blow on the head with a towel-roller, and thereby wounded him. He did this in order to effect his escape. In summing up, Maule, J., said: 'If the prisoner had killed this man it would have been murder, whether he intended to kill him or not; but I think that there is hardly evidence here to support the charge of an intent to murder. A person cannot have an intent to murder, or an intent to do any other thing, without intending to commit murder, or to do that other thing. It would be a contradiction in terms if it were otherwise. You will, therefore, consider whether the prisoner had an intent to kill this man, or only an intent to disable him, or to do him some grievous bodily harm' (a).

So where upon an indictment for attempting to suffocate and strangle with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoner had put a bed over his wife, and pressed it down upon her, and put a rope round her neck with a running noose on it, by which she was nearly prevented from breathing; Maule, J., told the jury, that in many cases a party might be guilty of murder if he caused the death by an illegal act, although at the time he did not actually intend to kill, and that in this case the prisoner would have been guilty of murder if his wife had died; but upon this indictment the jury must be satisfied that at the time the prisoner did the acts in question, he did intend to murder his wife (b). And in a later case, Coleridge, J., told the jury that the words 'with intent to commit murder' meant 'with intent to kill under such circumstances as would amount to the crime of murder, if death ensued' (c).

Upon an indictment for wounding with intent to murder, &c., it appeared that the prosecutor had given evidence against some wood-stealers, with whom the prisoner was intimate; the prisoner struck him with a tin can four times on the head, knocked him about, and said he would break his neck ; and there were two cuts on the prosecutor's scalp, which laid his skull bare. Alderson, B., in summing up, said : ' You will have to consider in this case whether, if death had ensued, the prisoner would have been guilty of murder ; and in giving your judgment on that question, you will have to consider whether the instrument employed was, in its ordinary use, likely to cause death ; or though an instrument unlikely under ordinary circumstances to cause death, whether it was used in such an extraordinary manner as to make it likely to cause death, either by continued blows or otherwise. A tin can, in its ordinary use, was not likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm ; but, if the prisoner struck the prosecutor repeated blows on the head with it, you will say whether he did this merely to hurt the prosecutor and give him pain, as by giving him a black eye or a bloody nose, or whether he did it to do him some substantial grievous bodily harm. The former enactments on this subject were confined to cutting instruments, and perhaps wisely ; but now the matter is much more vague, and cases ought therefore to be watched carefully. When a deadly weapon, such as a knife, a sword, or gun, is used, the intent of the party is manifest ; but with an instrument like the present, you must consider whether the mode in which it was used satisfactorily shews that the prisoner intended to inflict some serious or grievous bodily harm with it ' (d).

Upon an indictment for administering opium with intent to commit murder, it appeared that the prosecutrix had been left in charge of her master's house, and going out into the yard at night the prisoners threw her down, and said they would kill her if she did not swallow some stuff out of a phial which they held to her mouth, and which stuff the evidence tended to prove was a preparation of opium. She struggled, but was compelled to swallow it ; they then tied her apron tight over her face, and left her lying on her back in the yard. She was afterwards found almost insensible and very ill : by proper treatment she recovered in a few days ; but there was reason to conclude, that had she remained much longer undiscovered, her life would have been in very great peril. When her master returned he found the house robbed. For the prosecution it was contended, that if the main object of the prisoners was to steal from the house, and in order to effect that they committed an act in itself unlawful, they must be taken to have intended all the consequences likely to result from such act, and death was one of those consequences : it was immaterial which was the principal and which the subordinate intent. Coltman, J., told the jury that ' it would undoubtedly appear probable that one intention of the prisoners was to rob the house ; but they might have had that intention and also another, namely, to destroy life ; and if a noxious drug is administered, which is likely to occasion death, and the party administering it is indifferent whether it occasion death or not, that party must be looked upon as contemplating the probable results of his own action ' (e).

SECT. III.—OF UNLAWFUL ACTS CAUSING OR INTENDED OR CALCULATED TO CAUSE BODILY HARM.

A. Common Law.

Mayhem.—Mayhem, or the maiming of persons, was probably at one time a felony at common law, as the judgment was membrum pro membro (f). But this judgment afterwards went out of use; partly because the law of retaliation is at best an inadequate rule of punishment (g). The offence, therefore, appears to have been considered in later times, as a misdemeanor; and the only judgment which now remains for it at common law is fine and imprisonment (h). It is, however, spoken of by Coke as the greatest offence under felony (i).

A bodily hurt whereby a man is rendered less able in fighting, to defend himself or to annoy his adversary, is properly a maim at common law (j). Therefore cutting off, or disabling, or weakening a man's hand or finger, or striking out his eyes or foretooth, or depriving him of those parts, the loss of which, in all animals, abates their courage, are held to be maims; but the cutting off his ear, or nose, or the like, are not held to be maims at common law; because they do not weaken a man, but only disfigure him (k). In order to support an indictment for mayhem the act must be done maliciously, though it matters not how sudden the occasion (l).

If a person maims himself in order to have a more specious pretence for asking charity, or to prevent his being impressed as a sailor, or enlisted as a soldier, he may be indicted; and, on conviction, fined and imprisoned (m). For as the life and members of every subject are under the safeguard and protection of the King; so they are said to be in manu regis, to the end that they may serve the King and country when occasion shall require (n).

It would seem that there can be no accessories before the fact in mayhem, at common law; though there appears to have been some difference of opinion, or rather misapprehension, upon the subject (o). For, supposing the offence to be a misdemeanor only, the rule will apply, that in crimes under the degree of felony there can be no accessories, but that all persons concerned therein, if guilty at all, are principals (p). It does not appear to have been anywhere supposed that there can be accessories after the fact in mayhem (q).

(o) Hale (1 P.C. 613) states that there are no accessories before in mayhem, but that they are in the same degree as principals. Hawkins, on the contrary, says, that it seems there may be accessories before the fact in mayhem. 2 Hawk. c. 29, s. 5. In 1 East, P.C. 401, there is a learned argument to shew that the latter opinion proceeded on a mistake.

Maiming is not now indicted at common law, but under the enactments next to be noticed.

B. Statutes.

Felonious Wounding—By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 18 (r), ‘Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously by any means whatsoever (s) wound (t) or cause (u) any grievous bodily harm to any person, or shoot at any person (v), or, by drawing a trigger or in any other manner, attempt to discharge any kind of loaded arms (w) at any person, with intent, in any of the cases aforesaid, to maim, disfigure, or disable any person, or to do some other grievous bodily harm to any person (x), or with intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detainer of any person, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life’ . . . (y). Under this section the intent to maim, &c., is an essential element in the offence and must be charged and found (z), and the malicious intent must be found (zz).

As to the word ‘wound,’ see the note to that section. The word ‘any’ is substituted in two places for ‘such’ in order to provide for cases where the prisoner wounds, &c., A., when he intends to wound B., and the like. In R. v. Hewlett, 1 F. & F. 91, where on an indictment under 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 4, for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm to the prosecutor, it appeared that the prisoner with a knife struck at Withy, and the prosecutor interfered and caught the blow on his arm; Crowder, J., held that this would not sustain the charge; but the prisoner might be convicted of unlawfully wounding. There was no intent to injure the person wounded; it is therefore quite different from the cases where, though there is a mistake as to the person, the injury is intended for the person on whom it falls. This case is doubted in R. v. Stopford, 11 Cox, 643, and said to personal appearance, such as slitting nose or ears (b). The word 'disable' in 43 Geo. III. c. 58, s. 1 (rep.) was held to mean permanently and not temporarily disable (c). But for the words in the statute, 'to do some other grievous bodily harm,' it would be unnecessary in any indictment to charge an intent to maim, disfigure, or disable.

'Bodily harm' is not defined. It may mean internal as well as external injuries (d) and need not be permanent, nor dangerous, nor amount to maiming, disfigurement, or disablement. It is not grievous unless it seriously interferes with health or comfort (e). The following decisions on enactments superseded by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 11-15, 18, are of some value as a guide on the question of the various intents.

On an indictment for wounding with intent to murder, maim, disable, or do some grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner's goods had been distrained for rent, and one of the broker's men turned out of the room, and the broker said, 'Break the door open and go in and take possession again;' and the prisoner said, 'he would split open the head of any person who opened the door'; the door was then forced open, and as the prosecutor was entering the room, the prisoner, who had an axe in his hand, struck him on the head with it and inflicted a cut of about a quarter of an inch, and a graze of about half an inch on the forehead; the axe had cut through the skin and flesh, but very little below the surface of the skin. Parke, B., told the jury 'there was no proof of an intent to maim and disable, as the blow was aimed at the head of the prosecutor; it would have been otherwise if it had been aimed at his arm to prevent him being able to use it. The question, therefore, was, whether there was a wounding with intent either to murder the prosecutor or to do him some grievous bodily harm (f).

On an indictment for shooting at M., with a gun loaded with powder and blood, with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that M. was preaching in church when the gun was fired through a hole previously cut in the window: he was struck on the temple, knocked back and stunned; his face being sprinkled with blood; there was no wound, but grains of powder were embedded in the forehead; the eye was weak, and the effect of the blow felt for two months after. The surgeon said that had the charge struck the eye, or a place nearer to the eye, the result would have been much more serious; Willes, J., told the jury, 'You must be satisfied that the prisoner had an intent to do grievous bodily

(b) The words 'intent to maim or disfigure' are derived from Sir John Coventry's Act, 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 1, s. 7. See R. v. Woodburn and Coke, 16 St. Tr. 53.

(d) As to bodily harm by infection with disease, see R. v. Clarence, 22 Q.B.D. 23, doubting R. v. Sinclair, 13 Cox, 28.

(e) In R. v. Cox, R. & R. 362, the prisoner cut a female child, ten years old, in her private parts, probably to enlarge them to admit his entrance, but he was interrupted and fled; the wound was small, but bled a good deal; and when a surgeon saw it, four days afterwards, he found it near an inch in length, not deep nor dangerous, because below the hymen; but if it had entered the hymen it would have been dangerous. Graham, B., left it to the jury to say, whether this was not a grievous bodily injury; and if so, then, though there might have been an ulterior intention to commit a rape, yet, if there was an intent to do grievous bodily harm, the case was within the Act; and that the intention might be inferred from the cutting. The jury found the prisoner guilty, and the judges held the conviction right.

harm : it is not necessary that such harm should have been actually done, or that it should be either permanent or dangerous ; if it be such as seriously to interfere with comfort or health, it is sufficient ' (g).

On an indictment for shooting at a person with intent to maim, &c., it appeared that the prosecutor was hunting small birds, when the prisoner, a gamekeeper, came up with his gun, and ordered him off ; the prosecutor ran away, but had not got more than forty or fifty yards off when he heard the report of a gun, and at the same moment felt several shots rattling against his back and arms, one of which lodged in his finger : the prisoner afterwards said, ' He had warmed their tails a goodish bit for them ' ; Parke, B. : ' There can be no doubt that this is an assault, but I think the felonious part of the charge cannot be supported on these facts. In order to do so, it must appear clearly that the prisoner discharged the gun at the prosecutor with the intent laid in the indictment ; but he seems to have waited till the prosecutor had attained such a distance from him as not to be injured by the shot. He would rather appear to have fired after the prosecutor with a view of frightening him than with any serious intention of inflicting any injury on his person. This conduct, though very reprehensible, is not sufficient to bring the case within the Act, and he ought, therefore, to be acquitted of the felony ' (h).

On an indictment for feloniously wounding, it appeared that the prosecutor and his companion came up to the prisoner, who was fighting with his brother, and the prosecutor's companion said they were very quarrelsome people ; whereupon the prisoner knocked him down, and said he would do the same to the prosecutor, if he would fight ; the prosecutor refused, and threatened to take the law, and then the prisoner struck the prosecutor a blow with his fist, which broke the prosecutor's jaw on both sides of his face ; Alderson, B., told the jury that striking a blow, even though grievous bodily harm is done, is not in itself sufficient to shew an intent to do such grievous bodily harm ; that must be proved by other circumstances (i).

On an indictment for wounding with intent, &c., and for unlawful wounding, it appeared that the police ordered some gipsies to remove from a common by the direction of the owner of a neighbouring plantation, but not the lord of the manor ; they refused to do so, and one of them assaulted one of the police, who thereupon proceeded to take him into custody. The prosecutor took hold of two of the women, and while holding them the prisoner struck him on the back with a scythe, the edge of which was fenced, except two inches at the end, inflicting a wound half an inch deep, and an inch long ; it was contended that the prisoner could not be convicted even of wounding ; it was like the case where a person inflicted a wound with a nail on a stick, unknown to the person using it. Bramwell, B., said, ' The police had no right to interfere with the gipsies, except by the order of the owner of the land, and their resistance, without the use of weapons, would have been justifiable. As to the felony charged, a man is generally supposed, by the law, to intend the natural consequence of his act ; but in this case it is not so, and to find the prisoner guilty of the felony you must be satisfied of the existence of the actual intent (to wound) charged in the indictment. As to the unlawful wounding, if this case were like that put by the counsel for the prisoner, she would not be guilty, as it would be a mere accident. But it is for you to say whether, though the prisoner did not intend to wound, she did not know that the end of the scythe was uncovered, and therefore likely to wound. Suppose you fired a gun loaded with shot, at a person, but at such a distance, that you did not think it would reach him, and some of the shots did, that would be an unlawful wounding. You will say whether the prisoner is guilty of wounding with intent, or of unlawful wounding, or not guilty' (j).

Upon an indictment for maliciously wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner got into an altercation with the prosecutor, and challenged him to fight ; that he put down the blade of a scythe, and advanced towards the prosecutor to fight, but was prevented ; afterwards the prosecutor challenged the prisoner to fight, but they were again prevented, and the prosecutor and his party left, and some time after the prisoner and two other men followed the prosecutor and passed him. The prosecutor and his party followed, and challenged the prisoner to fight, and used provoking language. The prisoner then took his own road, and the prosecutor followed him, and again challenged him to fight, which the prisoner refused, and said he would go back and take the peace of him, and actually went back a few steps for that purpose : but the prosecutor got before him, and was making towards him, when the prisoner flourished his scythe, and told him to stand back, or he would cut him down, and himself retreated a few steps ; the prosecutor sprang on him, and seized him by the collar ; a scuffle ensued, in which the prisoner struck the prosecutor across the shoulder with the scythe, and produced a severe wound. Cresswell, J., said : ' The recent Act (7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 85), having omitted the proviso contained in the 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, the judges have determined that the facts will bring a case within this statute, if the offence would have amounted to manslaughter, in case death had ensued. If the act was done unlawfully and maliciously, that is, without lawful excuse, and intentionally, it is enough. Maliciously does not mean with premeditated malice, as in murder ; an intention to do the mischief unlawfully will satisfy the statute. Now, in order to render a case of homicide, committed with a deadly weapon, lawful on the ground of self-defence, it must appear that the party retreated as far as he possibly could, and then only used the weapon to avoid his own destruction. It is impossible to contend that the prisoner was so driven to use the scythe in this case ; the offence would have amounted to manslaughter if death had ensued, though certainly not an aggravated one ; and therefore you will be bound to say that the prisoner is guilty, if you believe he really intended to do grievous bodily harm' (k).

harm, it appeared that the prosecutor and the prisoner were fellow-servants, and the prosecutor had told the prisoner to cut some grass, which he ought to have done, but did not do, whereupon the prosecutor took a strap, and beat the prisoner with it, when the prisoner, who had lost his right arm, took out a clasp knife, and wounded the prosecutor with it. Platt, B. : ' One servant has clearly no right to strike another ; and if an under-servant conducts himself in a way in which the upper-servant thinks he ought not, the latter should inform his master, and let him act as he thinks proper, either by dismissing the under-servant or otherwise. In an ordinary case, a wrongful beating with a strap would not justify the other party in resorting to a knife, but there is certainly in this case the distinction that the prisoner has lost his right arm. The assault of the prisoner by the prosecutor was clearly illegal and unjustifiable, and if, under all the circumstances, you think that the prisoner acted in self-defence only, you ought to acquit him ; but if you think that in defending himself the prisoner used more violence than was necessary, you ought to find him guilty of wounding without the intent mentioned in the indictment ' (l).

It was held that if a wound was inflicted for the purpose of accomplishing a robbery, the defendant might be convicted under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 12 (rep.), if the jury found that he intended to disable or do grievous bodily harm (m).

Although the intent laid is that of doing grievous bodily harm, and upon the evidence it appears that the prisoner's main and principal intent was to prevent his lawful apprehension, yet he may be convicted, if, in order to effect the latter intent, he also intended to do grievous bodily harm (n).

A sexton and others surprised two body-stealers, and attempted to take them ; one of them cut the sexton's assistant with a sabre : and was indicted on 43 Geo. III. c. 58, s. 1 (rep.), for cutting, with the intent to murder, disable or do some other grievous bodily harm. The jury found that he cut with the intent to resist and prevent their apprehension, and for no other purpose. Upon a case reserved, the judges held, that the case would not have been within the Act unless the apprehension would have been lawful ; and that if the cutting was to resist or prevent a lawful apprehension, it should have been so stated, this being one of the intents mentioned in the Act ; and that, as the jury had negatived the intent stated, the conviction could not be supported (o).

Upon an indictment for shooting with intent to do grievous bodily harm, it appeared that the prisoner, being a constable, was employed to guard a copse from which wood had been stolen, and for this purpose he carried a loaded gun. From this copse he saw the prosecutor come out, carrying wood which he was stealing, and called to him to stop. The prosecutor ran away, and the prisoner, having no other means of bringing him to justice, fired and wounded him in the leg. It was alleged that the prosecutor was actually committing a felony, he having been before repeatedly convicted of stealing wood ; but these convictions were unknown to the prisoner, and there was no reason for supposing that he knew the difference between the rules of law relating to felony and those relating to less offences. Erle, J., told the jury, that ‘ shooting with intent to do grievous bodily harm amounted to the felony charged, unless from other facts there was a justification ; and that neither the belief of the prisoner that it was his duty to fire, if he could not otherwise apprehend the prosecutor ; nor the alleged felony, it being unknown to him, constituted such justification.’ The jury convicted ; and, upon a case reserved, the judges were unanimously of opinion that the prisoner was not justified in firing at the prosecutor, because the fact that the prosecutor was committing a felony was not known to the prisoner at the time, and therefore the conviction was right (p).

P., the prosecutor, who was a gamekeeper, proved that he met the prisoner sporting upon his manor, and remonstrated with him for so doing ; and proposed that the prisoner should go with him to the steward, saying, that if the steward would pardon him he should have no objection. The prisoner assented to go with him, and they walked together until they came near to the gamekeeper’s horse, which was about sixty yards off, when P. went on before him towards the horse ; and when he was at a short distance from the prisoner, the prisoner fired at his back, and ran away. On his way home P. saw the prisoner again, and the moment he looked round at him the prisoner again fired his gun, the discharge from which beat out one of P.’s eyes and several of his teeth. Between the first and second firing was about a quarter of an hour. In the course of the trial it was suggested that the prosecutor ought not to give evidence of two distinct felonies ; but the learned judge thought it unavoidable in this case, as it seemed to him to be one continued transaction, in the prosecution of the general malicious intent of the prisoner. Upon another ground also the learned judge thought such evidence proper. The counsel for the prisoner, by his cross-examination of P., had endeavoured to shew that the gun might have gone off the first time by accident ; and, although the learned judge was satisfied that this was not the case, he thought that the second firing was evidence to shew, that the first, which had preceded it only a quarter of an hour, was wilful ; and to remove the doubt, if any existed, in the minds of the jury. The prisoner having been convicted, the matter was submitted to the consideration of the judges, who were of opinion that the evidence was properly received, and the prisoner rightly convicted (q).

On an indictment charging the defendant with wounding A. with intent to do him grievous bodily harm the defendant may be properly convicted on evidence that he wounded A. in belief that he was some one else (r).

(r) R. v. Stopford, 11 Cox, 643. Brett, J., after consulting Mellor, J., told the jury that the question was whether the defendant meant to do grievous bodily harm to the man when he struck. He held R. v. Hewlett, 1 F. & F. 91 to be inconsistent with R. v. Smith, 1 Cox, 51, and R. v. Hunt, 1 Mood, 93.

SECT. IV.—OF UNLAWFUL WOUNDING.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 20 (s), ‘Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously wound or inflict any grievous bodily harm upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude . . .’ (t).

In R. v. Martin (u), the defendant, with the intention of causing terror in the minds of persons leaving a theatre, put out the gaslights on the staircase, and also, with the intention of obstructing the exit, placed an iron bar across the doorway. Several of them were injured. It was held that he had been rightly convicted on an indictment under this section of unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm upon two of the audience named in the indictment.

If in consequence of a reasonable and well-grounded fear of violence, a person jumps from a window, or into a river, to escape the threatened violence, and sustains grievous bodily harm; or if the person sustains grievous bodily harm in escaping from the threatened violence, this will amount to inflicting grievous bodily harm under the section.

A prisoner was charged under the section. He was drunk, and threatened his wife. He asked if she was in bed, she said she was not. He then said, ‘I’ll make you so that you can’t go to bed.’ The prisoner’s wife was frightened and opened the window and got one leg out, to get out. Her daughter caught hold of her and held her. The prisoner had got within reach of his wife, and was calling out to let her go; whereupon the daughter left hold, and the prisoner’s wife fell into the street and broke her leg. It was held (following R. v. Martin (v)) a correct direction to the jury, that if the prosecutrix’s apprehension was well grounded, taking into account the circumstances in which she was placed, and if getting out of the window was an act such as under the circumstances a woman might reasonably be led to take, they should find the prisoner guilty (w).

SECT. V.—OF SETTING ENGINES CALCULATED TO DESTROY HUMAN LIFE OR INFLICT GRIEVOUS BODILY HARM.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 31, ‘Whosoever shall set or place, or cause to be set or placed, any spring gun, man trap, or other engine calculated to destroy human life or inflict grievous bodily harm, with the intent that the same or whereby the same may destroy or inflict grievous bodily harm upon a trespasser or other person coming in contact therewith, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude . . . (x); and whosoever shall knowingly and wilfully permit any such spring gun, man trap, or other engine which may have been set or placed in any place then being in or afterwards coming into his possession or occupation by some other person, to continue so set or placed, shall be deemed to have set and placed such gun, trap, or engine with such intent as aforesaid: Provided that nothing in this section contained shall extend to make it illegal to set or place any gin or trap such as may have been or may be usually set or placed with the intent of destroying vermin: Provided also, that nothing in this section shall be deemed to make it unlawful to set or place, or cause to be set or placed, or to be continued set or placed, from sunset to sunrise, any spring gun, man trap, or other engine which shall be set or placed, or caused or continued to be set or placed, in a dwelling house, for the protection thereof (y).

It has been ruled that an alarm gun loaded with a shotted cartridge may be an engine calculated to destroy life within the section (z).

Causing death by engines set in contravention of this enactment is manslaughter (a).

Setting dog-spears in a wood is not an illegal act at common law, and it was not rendered so by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 18 (b).

SECT VI.—OF CAUSING BODILY HARM BY FURIOUS DRIVING OR OTHER WILFUL MISCONDUCT OR WILFUL NEGLIGENCE.

By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100) (c), sect. 35, 'Whosoever, having the charge of any carriage or vehicle, shall, by wanton or furious driving or racing, or other wilful misconduct, or by wilful neglect, do or cause to be done any bodily harm (c) to any person whatsoever, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour' (d).

The section extends to bicycles (e), and to all carriages whether drawn by animals or propelled by steam, petrol, electricity, or other mechanical means. Where death is caused by contravention of the enactment the slayer is liable to conviction of manslaughter (f).

(x) The punishment is now penal servitude from three to five years or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not over two years. 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212. The words omitted are repealed.

SECT. VII.—PROCEDURE, &c.

Where it is uncertain whether the defendant intended by his act to murder or to cause grievous bodily harm, &c., it is usual to insert counts varying the intent (g). A person who is present aiding and abetting when the criminal act is done is indictable as a principal, though his was not the hand by which the mischief was attempted or effected (h). But, if several are out for the purpose of committing a felony, and upon an alarm run different ways, and one of them maims a pursuer to avoid being taken, the others are not to be considered principals in such act (i).

Power to Convict of Unlawful Wounding on Indictment for Felonious Wounding.—By 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 5, 'If upon the trial of any indictment for any felony, except murder or manslaughter, where the indictment shall allege that the defendant did cut, stab, or wound any person, the jury shall be satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the cutting, stabbing, or wounding, but are not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the felony charged in such indictment, then and in every such case, the jury may acquit the defendant of such felony, and find him guilty of unlawfully cutting, stabbing, or wounding (j), and thereupon the defendant shall be liable to be punished in the same manner as if he had been convicted upon an indictment for the misdemeanor of cutting, stabbing, or wounding.'

This section appears to apply when the indictment alleges a felonious wounding, and does not apply to a felonious shooting with intent, &c. (k).

In R. v. Ward (l) the prisoner was indicted under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 18, for unlawfully, maliciously and feloniously wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm. The prosecutor was using a punt in a creek of a river for the purpose of shooting wild fowl, lying with his face downwards in the punt, and paddling with his arms over the sides. When slewing the punt round to return home he suddenly heard the report of a gun and found himself shot and wounded seriously. The prisoner had fired the shot in the direction of the punt with the intention of frightening the prosecutor from again coming into the creek for the purpose of fowling, and not with the intention of doing him grievous bodily harm. The prisoner at the time and afterwards asserted that if the prosecutor had not slewed the punt round at the moment of his shooting, the shot would not have struck him. The jury found the prisoner guilty of unlawful wounding. It was held that 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 5, must be construed as if the word 'malicious' were applied to wounding; and there was evidence of a malicious wounding by the prisoner and that the conviction was right.

On an indictment under sect. 20 (ante, p. 859), the defendant may be convicted of a common assault (m).

In R. v. Sparrow (n), where some counts charged the defendant with an assault on S. G., and with having thereby unlawfully and maliciously inflicted grievous bodily harm upon him, and another count was for a common assault, it appeared that the defendant struck the prosecutor with his fists two violent blows on the mouth, another on the temple, and a fourth on the back of the ear; three of his front teeth, and other teeth farther up were loosened; his gums were lacerated, and the mouth was swollen. The pain which was suffered immediately afterwards was insufferable; one of the front teeth and the back teeth had since partially fastened, but the two front teeth had not, and the prosecutor must lose them. The prosecutor had suffered much otherwise for a long time. The jury were told that the injuries inflicted fell within the definition of 'grievous bodily harm,' and that if they believed the witnesses, there was evidence to support the first counts; and that the question of whether the defendant intended to inflict grievous bodily harm did not arise, but that the simple point for their consideration was, 'did the defendant unlawfully assault the prosecutor, and thereby inflict upon him grievous bodily harm?' The verdict was, 'We find the defendant guilty of an aggravated assault, but without premeditation; it was done under the influence of passion.' It was then contended that this was a verdict of guilty upon the count for the common assault only; but a verdict of guilty was directed to be entered on the other counts, and, upon a case reserved, it was urged that the jury might have intended not to find the prisoner guilty of intending bodily harm, and that intention was a necessary ingredient in the offence, and the word 'maliciously' meant something more than 'intentionally'; but it was held that the direction was correct; that the language used by the jury must be construed by looking at the subject matter of the charge, and what was left to the jury; and that the assault was intentional in the eye of the law, though committed without premeditation and under the influence of passion.

Upon an indictment against three for maliciously wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm, the jury may convict two of the felony charged, and the third of unlawfully wounding (o).

In R. v. Waudby (p), one prisoner was charged on the first count with feloniously shooting at F. with intent to do him grievous bodily harm and another prisoner was charged with feloniously aiding and abetting him to commit the felony, and on a second count with feloniously wounding F. with like intent. The jury found the one guilty of unlawful wounding, and the other guilty of aiding and abetting. On a case reserved, the question was raised whether the second prisoner could, on such an indictment, be convicted of aiding and abetting in the misdemeanor. The conviction of both was upheld (q).

(q) The decision appears to be perfectly correct if the conviction on the second count be kept in view. If it rested on the first count it would be inconsistent with R. v. Miller (ante, p. 861), and with the words of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 5, ante, p. 861.

CANADIAN NOTES.

Sec. 1.—Of Conspiring and Incitement to Murder.Conspiring and Counselling to Murder.—Code sec. 266.Sec. 2.—Attempts to Commit Murder.—Code sec. 264.

An indictment that “A. B. attempted to kill and murder C. D.” sufficiently discloses an indictable offence, and the Court has the power to allow it to be amended so as to read that “A. B. with intent to commit murder, shot at C. D.” The King v. Mooney, 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 333.

An indictment multifarious in that it combines a charge of a failure to provide necessaries for a child under sixteen under secs. 242 and 244 with a charge of an attempt to murder the child, to which indictment the prisoners pleaded, is sufficient upon which to base a conviction thereon for the latter offence without a formal amendment of the indictment, where the presiding Judge has withdrawn from the jury that portion of the charge based upon secs. 242 and 244. R. v. Lapierre (1897), 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 413 (Que.).

The prosecution must prove the intent as well as the assault. Re Kelly (1902), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 541.

Upon a charge of causing grievous bodily harm to a child under defendant's care with intent to bring about the child's death, evidence of acts of cruelty by defendants to another child also in defendant's care are irrelevant to the case and inadmissible. R. v. Lapierre (1897), 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 413 (Que.).

On the trial of a person accused of attempt to murder by shooting, evidence that he had burglar's tools in his possession at the time is admissible, as tending to prove criminal intent. It is proper for the Judge, in charging the jury in a trial for an attempt to murder, to instruct them that they may draw an inference as to the prisoner's intent to kill from the circumstances of his being a stranger loitering in a street or park, between four and five o'clock in the morning, with a loaded revolver and burglar's tools in his possession. The King v. Mooney, 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 333.

Sec. 3.—Of Unlawful Acts Causing or Calculated to Cause Bodily Harm.Felonious Wounding.—Code sec. 273.

The intent may be inferred from the act committed. R. v. LeDante, 2 Geldert & Oxley (N.S.) 401.

Upon an indictment charging a shooting at a person with intent, a verdict for common assault may be rendered. Re Cronan (1874), 24 U.C.C.P. 106.

Upon the trial of an indictment for wounding with intent to disable, a verdict of "guilty without malicious intent" is equivalent to a verdict of acquittal, although the jury were instructed that if intent to disable were negatived they might still convict of the simple offence of wounding. Such verdict is to be construed as a finding that the act of the accused which resulted in wounding the complainant was done without malice. (The King v. Slaughenwhite (No. 1), 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 53, 37 N.S.R. 382, reversed.) Slaughenwhite v. The King; The King v. Slaughenwhite (No. 2), 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 173, 35 Can. S.C.R. 607.

Upon a charge of shooting with intent to do grievous bodily harm in which the plea is self-defence, it is a question for the jury, whether the assault upon the accused, which had provoked the shooting, had ended or was still being pursued. It is mis-direction to charge the jury that, to support the plea of self-defence to the infliction of grievous bodily harm, they must find that the accused could not otherwise have preserved himself from death or grievous bodily harm, it being a sufficient justification if the accused had a reasonable apprehension of grievous bodily harm to himself from the violence of the assault upon him, and if he believed on reasonable grounds that he could not preserve himself from grievous bodily harm otherwise than by inflicting grievous bodily harm upon his assailant. The King v. Ritter, 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 31, Cr. Code secs. 53 and 54.

Bodily Injury by Unlawful Act or Omission.—Code sec. 284.

This sec. (284) is not in any English Act. The Imperial Commissioners on the Draft Code of 1879 recommended it, but there was a minority report against it, and it was not enacted.

Although a corporation cannot be guilty of manslaughter, it may be indicted under sec. 222 and possibly also under this section for having caused grievous bodily injury by omitting to maintain in a safe condition a bridge or structure which it was its duty to so maintain, and this notwithstanding that death ensued at once to the person sustaining the grievous bodily injury. A fine is the punishment which must be substituted under Cr. Code sec. 920 in the case of a corporation, in lieu of the imprisonment mentioned in Cr. Code sec. 284, and the amount is in the discretion of the Court (Cr. Code sec. 1029). The expression "grievous bodily injury" includes injuries immediately resulting in death, and as a corporation is not amenable to a charge of manslaughter, the death is as to it a circumstance in aggravation of the crime, and does not enlarge the nature of the offence. R. v. Union Colliery Co. (1900), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 523 (B.C.); affirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada sub nom., Union Colliery v. The Queen (1900), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 400, 31 Can. S.C.R. 81.

Sec. 4.—Unlawful Wounding.—Code sec. 274.

A conviction for inflicting grievous bodily harm under sec. 274 which provides a punishment for the person “who unlawfully wounds or inflicts any grievous bodily harm upon any other person” need not state that the act was done “unlawfully,” that term in the section being referable only to the offence of wounding. R. v. Treadwell (1902), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 461.

Sec. 5.—Of Setting Engines Calculated to Destroy Human Life or Inflict Grievous Bodily Harm.—Code sec. 281.

The words “actual bodily harm” in sec. 295 would be fully covered by the least bodily harm, whilst the offence provided in sec. 274 has added to it an aggravating element which makes the bodily harm grievous. R. v. Hostetter (1902), 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 221.

Justices of the peace have no power on a preliminary investigation before them of a charge of unlawfully wounding, to reduce the charge to one of common assault, over which they would have summary jurisdiction. R. v. Lee (1897), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 233; Miller v. Lea (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 282. A conviction recorded by justices in such a case upon a plea of guilty to the charge as reduced, is not a bar to an indictment for unlawfully wounding, based upon the same state of facts and does not support a plea of autrefois convict. Ibid.

Sec. 6.—Causing Bodily Harm by Furious Driving or Other Wilful Misconduct or Wilful Neglect.

Punishment for.—Code sec. 285.

As to the meaning of the term “wilful neglect,” e.g., wilfully refusing or neglecting to maintain a wife, see Anonymous Case (1902), 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 163 (Que.). A “wilful” refusal to allow a person to vote means a refusal which is perverse or malicious. Johnson v. Allen, 26 O.R. 550.

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

OF ATTEMPTING TO CHOKE OR TO INJURE BY POISON OR EXPLOSIVES.

SECT. I.—OF ATTEMPTING TO CHOKE, &c., AND USING DRUGS
IN ORDER TO COMMIT OFFENCES.

ATTEMPTS to suffocate or strangle with intent to commit murder are punishable under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 14, ante, p. 841.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 21 (a), 'Whosoever shall, by any means whatsoever, attempt to choke, suffocate, or strangle any other person, or shall, by any means calculated to choke, suffocate, or strangle, attempt to render any other person insensible, unconscious, or incapable of resistance, with intent in any of such cases thereby to enable himself or any other person to commit, or with intent in any of such cases thereby to assist any other person in committing any indictable offence, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . (b).

A male person convicted under the above section may, in addition to the punishment awarded by the section (as amended in 1891) or any part thereof be sentenced to be whipped under the Garrotters Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 44), which is set out ante, p. 216.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 22 (c), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully apply or administer to or cause to be taken by, or attempt to apply or administer to or attempt to cause to be administered to or taken by any person, any chloroform, laudanum, or other stupefying or overpowering drug, matter, or thing, with intent in any of such cases thereby to enable himself or any other person to commit or with intent in any of such cases thereby to assist any other person in committing, any indictable offence, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . ' (b).

By 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, s. 3, sub-s. 3 (post, p. 956) it is an indictable misdemeanor to apply, administer to, or cause to be taken by any woman or girl, any drug, matter, or thing, with intent to stupefy or overpower so as to enable any person to have a lawful carnal connection with such woman or girl (d).

(a) This section was new law in 1861.

(b) Or not less than three years or to imprisonment with or without hard labour for not more than two years; 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212. The words omitted in s. 21, 22 were repealed in 1892, S. L. R.; s. 21 was new law in 1861.

(c) Taken from 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 3. The words in italics in the beginning of this section were introduced for the same reason as those in s. 14. See the note to that section, ante, p. 841.

(d) Corroboration is necessary, s. 3, proviso.

SECT. II.—OF THE USE OF POISON TO COMMIT CRIME.

Persons who administer or attempt to administer or cause or attempt to cause to be administered to or taken by any person, any poison or other destructive things with intent to commit murder are punishable under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, sects. 11, 14, ante, pp. 840, 841.

By sect. 23 (e), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously administer to or cause to be administered to or taken by any other person any poison or other destructive or noxious thing, so as thereby to endanger the life of such person, or so as thereby to inflict upon such person any grievous bodily harm, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding ten years . . .' (f).

By sect. 24 (g), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously administer to or cause to be administered to or taken by any other person any poison or other destructive or noxious thing, with intent to injure, aggrieve, or annoy such person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude . . .' (h).

By sect. 25, 'If upon the trial of any person for any felony in the last but one preceding section mentioned, the jury shall not be satisfied that such person is guilty thereof, but shall be satisfied that he is guilty of any misdemeanor in the last preceding section mentioned, then and in every such case the jury may acquit the accused of such felony, and find him guilty of such misdemeanor, and thereupon he shall be liable to be punished in the same manner as if convicted upon an indictment for such misdemeanor' (i).

Poison or Other Destructive Thing:—Upon an indictment for administering poison with intent to murder, it appeared that the prisoner had administered to a child nine weeks old two cocculus indicus berries. The child vomited one of them up, and the other passed through her body in the course of nature. Two medical men proved that the cocculus indicus berry is classed with narcotic poisons: the poison consists in the presence

(f) For other punishments, see 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212. The words omitted were repealed in 1892 (S. L. R.).

(g) Taken from 23 & 24 Vict. c. 8, s. 2. Upon an indictment on that section for administering cantharides to a female, with intent to injure, aggrieve, and annoy her, it appeared that the prisoner, unknown to the prosecutrix, put cantharides into a cup of tea which she drank, and was very ill in consequence. This drug taken in large quantities is poisonous, but it is administered by medical men as a stimulant to the kidneys and bladder. The jury found that the prisoner administered the cantharides with intent to excite the sexual passion and desire of the prosecutrix, in order that he might obtain connection with her, and on a case reserved, after a verdict of guilty, on the question whether the intent above stated was an intent to injure, aggrieve or annoy within the statute, the conviction was affirmed. R. v. Wilkins, L. & C. 89. But where cantharides was administered in such a small quantity as to be incapable of doing any mischief, although administered with the intent to cause inconvenience and annoyance, Cockburn, C.J., after consulting Hawkins, J., held that this was no 'administering of a noxious thing' within the section. R. v. Hennah, 13 Cox, 547. For decisions on the earlier law see R. v. Walkden, 1 Cox, 282. R. v. Hanson, 2 C. & K. 912. R. v. Vaughan, 8 Cox, 256.

(h) For other punishments, see 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212. The words omitted were repealed in 1892 (S. L. R.).

(i) This section re-enacts 23 & 24 Vict. c. 8, s. 3.

of an alkaloid, which is extracted from the kernel ; all the noxious properties are in the kernel ; it has a very hard exterior or pod, to break which much force is required. One of these witnesses added that the berry, if the pod is broken, is calculated to produce death in an adult human subject, though he did not know how many would be required for the purpose : he thought the poison contained in the kernels of two berries, if the pods were burst, and if retained on the stomach, might produce death in a child of nine weeks old, but that the berry could not be digested by the child, and that it would pass through its body without the pod being burst, and so would be innocuous. It was objected that the berries were not poison within the meaning of the statute ; for that though the kernel of the berries contained poison, yet the pod rendered the poison innocuous. The objection was overruled, and upon a case reserved, the judges were unanimously of opinion that the conviction was right. Wilde, C.J., said : ' It is admitted that the kernel is poison though not the pod ; part of the berry is therefore admitted to be poison, though not the whole. The whole berry was administered, and with intent to kill. The act, therefore, of administering poison with intent to kill is proved. The effect of that act is beside the question : the act was an administering poison, which failed to produce the intended effect. We all think the conviction right ' (j).

If a person mix poison with coffee, and tells another that the coffee is for her, and she take it in consequence, it seems that this is an administering, and at all events, it is a causing the poison to be taken (k).

On an indictment for attempting to administer poison it appeared that the prisoner had bought some salts of sorrel, and put it in a sugar-basin in order that the prosecutor might take it with his tea, and the prosecutor and his wife took some of it with their tea, and discovered that something was wrong, and this led to a discovery of the poison ; Wightman, J., held, that if the prisoner put the poison in the sugar intending that it should be taken, that was an attempt to administer it (l).

If A. delivered poison to B. for the purpose of his administering it to C. in A.'s absence, A. was not liable to be convicted under 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 3, of an attempt to administer poison to C., if B. were a guilty agent (m).

property are, for reasons of practical convenience, dealt with together in this chapter.

By the Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), s. 9 (n), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously, by the explosion of gunpowder or other explosive substance, destroy, throw down, or damage the whole or any part of any dwelling-house, any person being therein, or of any building, whereby the life of any person shall be endangered, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be kept in penal servitude for life, . . . or to be imprisoned, . . . and, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping' (o).

On an indictment under this section it was held by Lopes, J., after consulting Lord Coleridge, C.J., that the endangering of life must result from the damage done to the building mentioned in the indictment, but that it was not necessary that the persons whose lives were endangered should have been inside the building. For the purpose of proving such endangering of life evidence of damage to other buildings that might be inhabited was inadmissible, though such evidence was admissible to shew the nature and extent of the explosion and its tendency to destroy the particular building. To endanger within this section includes not only actual injury received but also exposure to, or chance of, injury (p).

By sect. 10 (q), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously place or throw in, into, upon, under, against, or near any building any gunpowder or other explosive substance, with intent to destroy or damage any building or any engine, machinery, working tools, fixtures, goods, or chattels, shall, whether or not any explosion take place, and whether or not any damage be caused, be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen . . . years, or to be (n) This section embodies 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25, ss. 1, 2. Under s. 2 of that Act, where life was endangered, the offence was capital. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 12 (ante, p. 840).

(p) R. v. McGrath, 14 Cox, 598.

(q) Taken from 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25, s. 6. In R. v. Brown, 3 F. & F. 821, the prisoners were indicted under this section for damaging the house of J. Gate by the explosion of gunpowder, J. Gate and his wife being therein. In Cumberland there is a custom in country places, when a wedding has taken place, for the neighbours to assemble with guns, and fire a kind of feu de joie in honour of the event, the bridegroom or his friends treating them. In pursuance of this custom the prisoners and others went with a gun thus to celebrate the marriage of Gate's daughter with one Noble. On arriving at Gate's house they asked for drink, and said they had come to shoot. Noble treated them to beer, and gave the one who had the gun 2s. 6d. not to fire. Having got the beer, they wanted something to eat, but were put out of Gate's house. They then began to fire the gun; at first in front of the house; then they fired under the door, filling the house with smoke. They fired off the gun next through the keyhole of the door, and, being out of percussion-caps, applied a candle to the nipple for the purpose. The effect of this shot was to drive the key with great violence into the house, cutting the arm of Mrs. Gate, and knocking Gate insensible off his chair, by striking him on the head. It also blew the lock of the door to pieces, and split the door. The prisoners were afterwards very abusive and violent on the inmates rushing out to capture them and their gun. Martin, B., was of opinion that the statute was not meant to apply to such a case as this, but rather to malicious injuries to houses, by placing or throwing explosive substances against or into them, with intent to destroy the house or injure the inmates. This was more in the nature of wanton mischief or assault, and he directed an acquittal. 'If this case is correctly reported, it deserves reconsideration.' C. S. G.

imprisoned, . . . and, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping (r).

By sect. 45 (rr), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously place or throw in, into, upon, against, or near any ship or vessel any gunpowder or other explosive substance, with intent to destroy or damage any ship or vessel, or any machinery, working tools, goods, or chattels, shall, whether or not any explosion take place, and whether or not any injury be effected, be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years, . . . or to be imprisoned, . . . and, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping (r).

Shooting into a house has been held not to be within sect. 9 (s).

The prisoners were indicted under sect. 10 for throwing gunpowder against a house with intent to damage. It appeared that they had thrown a bottle containing gunpowder against a window of a house, and that in the neck of the bottle there was a fuse, and Kelly, C.B., held that unless the fuse in the bottle was lighted at the time the bottle was thrown against the house the offence was not made out, but said: 'I do not say that it is necessary that the light should pass from the fuse to the powder in the bottle and that an explosion should take place. It is enough to constitute the offence if once the light was applied to the fuse before the bottle was thrown, although it might go out before the bottle struck the house and no explosion actually resulted from it. . . . If anybody merely threw a bottle containing gunpowder that would not comply with the conditions of the statute. If the fuse was not lighted, it could not cause an explosion, and it would be merely throwing a bottle against a house' (t).

By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 28 (u), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously, by the explosion of gunpowder or other explosive substance, burn, maim, disfigure, disable, or do any grievous bodily harm to any person, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . or to be imprisoned . . . and if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping (r).

By sect. 29 (v), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously cause any gunpowder or other explosive substance to explode, or send or deliver to or cause to be taken or received by any person any explosive substance or any other dangerous or noxious thing, or put or lay at any place, or cast or throw at or upon or otherwise apply to any person, any corrosive fluid or any destructive (vv) or explosive substance, with intent in any of the cases aforesaid to burn, maim, disfigure, or disable any person, or to do some grievous bodily harm to any person, shall, whether any bodily harm

This section is by the Gunbarrel Proof Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. cxiii.), s. 123, extended to persons knowingly sending for proof a gun barrel containing any explosive substance.

Where the prisoner threw an electric fuse detonator out of a railway carriage window, and it was picked up by the prosecutor, and exploded and injured him, it was held that it was a question for the jury as to the intent with which the prisoner had acted (x).

By sect. 30 (y), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously place or throw in, into, upon, against, or near any building, ship, or vessel, any gunpowder or other explosive substance, with intent to do any bodily injury to any person, shall, whether or not any explosion take place, and whether or not any bodily injury be effected, be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years . . . or to be imprisoned . . . and if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping' (w).

By sect. 64 (z), 'Whosoever shall knowingly have in his possession, or make or manufacture any gunpowder, explosive substance, or any dangerous or noxious thing, or any machine, engine, instrument, or thing, with intent by means thereof to commit, or for the purpose of enabling any other person to commit, any of the felonies in this Act mentioned, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, . . . and, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping . . . By sect. 65, 'Any justice of the peace of any county or place in which any such gunpowder, or other explosive, dangerous, or noxious substance or thing, or any such machine, engine, instrument, or thing, is suspected to be made, kept, or carried for the purpose of being used in committing any of the felonies of this Act mentioned, upon reasonable cause assigned upon oath by any person, may issue a warrant under his hand and seal for searching in the day-time any house, mill, magazine, storehouse, warehouse, shop, cellar, yard, wharf, or other place, or any carriage, waggon, cart, ship, boat, or vessel, in which the same is suspected to be made, kept, or carried for such purpose as hereinbefore mentioned; and every person acting in the execution of any such warrant shall have, for seizing, removing to proper places, and detaining all such gunpowder, explosive, dangerous, or noxious substances, machines, engines, instruments, or things, found upon such search, which he shall have good cause to suspect to be intended to be used in committing any such offence, and the barrels, packages, cases, and other receptacles in which the same shall be, the

By the Explosive Substances Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 3), s. 2, ' Any person who unlawfully and maliciously causes by any explosive substance an explosion of a nature likely to endanger life, or to cause serious injury to property, shall, whether any injury to person or property has been actually caused or not, be guilty of felony, and on conviction shall be liable to penal servitude for life, or for any less term (not less than the minimum term allowed by law) (c) or to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding two years.'

By sect. 3, ' Any person who within or (being a subject of His Majesty) without His Majesty's dominions unlawfully and maliciously—

(a) does any act with intent to cause, by an explosive substance, or conspires to cause by an explosive substance, an explosion in the United Kingdom of a nature likely to endanger life or to cause serious injury to property, or,

(b) makes or has in his possession or under his control any explosive substance with intent by means thereof to endanger life or cause serious injury to property in the United Kingdom, or to enable any other person by means thereof to endanger life or cause serious injury to property in the United Kingdom, shall, whether any explosion does or does not take place, and whether any injury to person or property has been actually caused or not be guilty of felony, and on conviction shall be liable to penal servitude for a term not exceeding twenty years (d), or to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding two years, and the explosive substance shall be forfeited.'

By sect. 4 (1), ' Any person who makes or knowingly has in his possession or under his control any explosive substance under such circumstances as to give rise to a reasonable suspicion that he is not making it, or does not have it in his possession or under his control for a lawful object, shall, unless he can shew that he made it, or had it in his possession, or under his control for a lawful object, be guilty of felony, and on conviction shall be liable to penal servitude for a term not exceeding fourteen years (e), or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour, and the explosive substance shall be forfeited (f).

' (2) In any proceeding against any person for a crime under this section, such person and his wife or husband, as the case may be, may, if such person thinks fit, be called, sworn, examined, and cross-examined as an ordinary witness in the case ' (g).

(b) There is a like provision in 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 55. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 139 was repealed by the Explosives Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 17), s. 122. By s. 86 of the Act of 1875 the power of search for gunpowder under the repealed enactment is now exercised under the Act of 1875.

(c) Now three years : 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, p. 211.

(d) The minimum term is three years ; vide ante, p. 211.

(e) Nor less than three years, ante, p. 211.

(f) If several persons are connected in a common design to have an explosive substance made for an unlawful purpose, each of the confederacy is responsible in respect of such articles as are in the possession of others for the carrying out of their common design. R. v. Charles, 17 Cox, 499.

(g) As to present position of this subsection see 61 & 62 Vict. c. 36, post, Bk. xiii. c. v.

By sect. 5, 'Any person who within or (being a subject of His Majesty) without His Majesty's dominions by the supply of or solicitation for money, the providing of premises, the supply of materials, or in any manner whatsoever procures, counsels, aids, abets, or is accessory to the commission of any crime under this Act, shall be guilty of felony, and shall be liable to be tried and punished for that crime as if he had been guilty as a principal.' (Vide ante, Book I. Chapter V.)

Sect. 6 gives power to the Attorney-General, where he has reason to believe that a crime has been committed under the Act, to authorise any justice of the peace to hold an inquiry. The evidence taken at such inquiry is, however, not to be used against the witness giving such evidence except in case of perjury. Absconding witnesses may be arrested.

By sect. 7 (1), 'If any person is charged before a justice with any crime under this Act, no further proceeding shall be taken against such person without the consent of the Attorney-General, except such as the justice may think necessary by remand or otherwise to secure the safe custody of such person.

'(2) In framing an indictment the same criminal act may be charged in different counts as constituting different crimes under this Act, and upon the trial of any such indictment the prosecutor shall not be put to his election as to the count on which he must proceed.

'(3) For all purposes of and incidental to arrest, trial, and punishment, a crime for which a person is liable to be punished under this Act, when committed out of the United Kingdom, shall be deemed to have been committed in the place in which such person is apprehended or is in custody.

'(4) This Act shall not exempt any person from any indictment or proceeding for a crime or offence which is punishable at common law or by any Act of Parliament other than this Act; but no person shall be punished twice for the same criminal act' (h).

Sect. 8 deals with the search for the seizure of explosive substances (i), and by sect. 9 (1), 'The expression "explosive substance" shall be deemed to include any materials for making any explosive substance, also any apparatus, machine, implement, or materials used or intended to be used or adapted for causing or aiding in causing any explosion in or with any explosive substance, also any part of any such apparatus, machine, or implement' (j).

Any part of a vessel which, when filled with an explosive substance, is adapted for causing an explosion, is an explosive substance (k).

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO RAILWAYS AND PASSENGERS THEREON.

ALTHOUGH, perhaps, it may be departing from a strictly accurate distribution of offences to collect the clauses creating offences relating to railways and railway trains in one chapter, yet, as such a course appears to be likely to be of more practical utility, it has been adopted.

By the Railway Regulation Act, 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 13), ' It shall be lawful for any officer or agent of any railway company, or for any special constable duly appointed, and all such persons as they may call to their assistance, to seize and detain any engine driver, guard, porter, or other servant in the employ of such company who shall be found drunk while employed upon the railway, or commit any offence against any of the byelaws, rules or regulations of such company, or shall wilfully, maliciously, or negligently do or omit to do any act whereby the life or limb of any person passing along or being upon the railway belonging to such company, or the works thereof respectively, shall be or might be injured or endangered, or whereby the passage of any of the engines, carriages, or trains shall be or might be obstructed or impeded, and to convey such engine driver, guard, porter, or other servant so offending, or any person counselling, aiding, or assisting in such offence, with all convenient despatch, before some justice of the peace for the place within which such offence shall be committed, without any other warrant or authority than this Act; and every such person so offending, and every person counselling, aiding, or assisting therein as aforesaid, shall, when convicted before such justice as aforesaid (who is hereby authorised and required, upon complaint to him made, upon oath, without information in writing (a), to take cognisance thereof, and to act summarily in the premises), in the discretion of such justice, be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two calendar months, or, in the like discretion of such justice, shall for every such offence forfeit to His Majesty any sum not exceeding ten pounds, and in default of payment thereof shall be imprisoned, with or without hard labour as aforesaid . . . ' (b).

By sect. 14, ' Provided always, and be it enacted, that (if upon the hearing of any such complaint he shall think fit) it shall be lawful for such justice, instead of deciding upon the matter of complaint summarily, to commit the person or persons charged with such offence for trial for the

(a) Qu. whether this exception to the general rules under the Indictable Offences Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42) or the Summary Jurisdiction Acts is still in force.

(b) The provisions of the section as to imprisonment in default of paying the fine were repealed in 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 43, s. 4), as having been superseded by s. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49).

same at the Quarter Sessions for the county or place wherein such offence shall have been committed, and to order that any such person so committed shall be imprisoned and detained in any of His Majesty's gaols or houses of correction in the said county or place in the meantime, or to take bail for his appearance, with or without sureties, in his discretion; and every such person so offending, and convicted before such Court of Quarter Sessions as aforesaid (which said Court is hereby required to take cognisance of and hear and determine such complaint), shall be liable, in the discretion of such Court, to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years.'

By sect. 21, 'Wherever the word "railway" is used in this Act it shall be construed to extend to all railways constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament, and intended for the conveyance of passengers in or upon carriages drawn or impelled by the power of steam or by any other mechanical power; and wherever the word "company" is used in this Act it shall be construed to extend to and include the proprietors for the time being of any such railway, whether a body corporate or individuals, and their lessees, executors, administrators, and assigns, unless the subject or context be repugnant to such construction.'

By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100) s. 32, (c) 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously put or throw upon or across any railway any wood, stone or other matter or thing, or shall unlawfully and maliciously take up, remove, or displace any rail, sleeper, or other matter or thing belonging to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously, turn, move, or divert any points or other machinery belonging to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously make or shew, hide or remove, any signal or light upon or near to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously do or cause to be done any other matter or thing, with intent, in any of the cases aforesaid, to endanger the safety of any person travelling or being upon such railway, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . or to be imprisoned . . . and, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping' (d).

By sect. 33 (e), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously throw, or cause to fall or strike, at, against, into, or upon any engine, tender, carriage, or truck used upon any railway, any wood, stone, or other matter or thing, with intent to injure or endanger the safety of any person

(c) Taken from 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 6, and the word 'unlawfully' is substituted for 'wilfully' throughout.

(d) For present punishments see 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212. The words omitted are repealed.

(e) Taken from 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 7. The word 'unlawfully' is substituted for 'wilfully.' The introduction of the word 'at' extends this section to cases where the missile fails to strike any engine or carriage. The other words in italics were introduced to meet cases where a person throws into or upon one carriage of a train, when he intended to injure a person in another carriage in the same train, and similar cases.

In R. v. Court, 6 Cox, 202, the prisoner was indicted for throwing a stone against a tender with intent to endanger the safety of persons on the tender, and it appeared that the stone fell on the tender, but there was no person on it at the time, and it was held that the section was limited to something thrown upon an engine or carriage having some person therein, and consequently that no offence within the statute was proved, but this case would clearly come within the clause. As to punishing youthful offenders in a summary manner, see 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49 (E), 47 & 48 Vict. c. 19 (I), which supersede 34 & 35 Vict. c. 78, s. 13.

being in or upon such engine, tender, carriage, or truck, or in or upon any other engine, tender, carriage, or truck of any train of which such first-mentioned engine, tender, carriage, or truck shall form part, shall be guilty of felony and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . (f).

An acquittal of the felony created by sect. 32 has been held to be no bar to a prosecution on the same facts for an offence against s. 33 (g).

By sect. 34, 'Whosoever by any unlawful act (h), or by any wilful omission or neglect, shall endanger, or cause to be endangered, the safety of any person conveyed or being in or upon a railway, or shall aid or assist therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour' (i).

By the Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97) s. 33, it is a felony unlawfully and maliciously to pull down or destroy a bridge or viaduct or aqueduct over or under which a railway passes, with intent to render the bridge, &c., dangerous or impassable (j).

By sect. 35 (k), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously put (l) place, cast, or throw upon or across any railway any wood, stone, or other matter or thing, or shall unlawfully and maliciously take up, remove, or displace any rail, sleeper, or other matter or thing belonging to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously turn, move, or divert any points or other machinery belonging to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously make or shew, hide or remove, any signal or light upon or near to any railway, or shall unlawfully and maliciously do or cause to be done any other matter or thing, with intent, in any of the cases aforesaid, to obstruct, upset, overthrow, injure, or destroy any engine, tender, carriage, or truck using such railway, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court

(f) For present punishments see 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212. The words omitted are repealed.

(h) Two boys went upon premises of a railway company and began playing with a heavy cart which was near the line. Being started by the boys, the cart ran down an embankment by its own impetus. One boy tried to divert its course; the other cried to him, 'Let it go.' The cart ran on until it passed through a hedge and a fence of posts and rails and over a ditch to the railway, and it rested so close to the railway lines as to obstruct any carriage passing upon them. The boys did not attempt to remove it. It was held, that as the first act of removing the cart was a trespass, and therefore an unlawful act, and as the jury found that the natural consequence of it was, that the cart ran through the hedge, and so on to the railway, the boys might be properly convicted under the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 34. R. v. Monaghan, 11 Cox, 608 (Ir.), Piggott, B. The defendant with a cart arrived at the gates of a level crossing, and having twice shouted for the gate-man, who was in a hut close by, without receiving any answer, opened the gates himself and crossed the line. A passing train collided with the cart and sustained injury. He was indicted under s. 36 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), and s. 34 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, but the jury acquitted him, holding the gate-man to blame. R. v. Strange, 16 Cox, 552. See R. v. Pittwood, 19 T. L. R. 37.

(i) Framed from 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15, the words of which were, any person who 'shall wilfully do, or cause to be done, anything in such a manner as to obstruct any engine or carriage using any railway, or to endanger the safety of persons conveyed in or upon the same.' The present section extends to any unlawful act and any wilful omission or neglect.

(k) Framed from 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 6, with the substitution of 'unlawfully' for 'wilfully.'

to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . or to be imprisoned . . . and, if a male under the age of sixteen, with or without whipping' (m).

By sect. 36, 'Whosoever by any unlawful act, or by any wilful omission or neglect, shall obstruct or cause to be obstructed (n) any engine or carriage using any railway, or shall aid or assist therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour' (o).

An acquittal on an indictment for felony under sect. 35 has been held no bar to a subsequent indictment on the same facts for a misdemeanor under sect. 36 (p).

Malice.—In the case of an indictment for offences under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, it is not necessary to prove malice against the owner of the property against which the offence is committed (q). There is no similar provision in the Offences against the Person Act, 1861. Maliciously, in the enactments above set forth appears to mean

(m) For present punishments see 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 211. The words omitted are repealed.

(n) Where a drunken man got upon a railway and altered the signals, in consequence of which a luggage train shut off steam, and was brought 'very near to a stand,' it was held there was an 'obstruction' within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 36. R. v. Hadfield, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 253; 39 L. J. M. C. 131; 11 Cox, 574, Martin, B., diss. The defendant placed himself on the space between two lines of railways, at a spot between two stations, and held up his arms in the mode used by inspectors of the line when desirous of stopping a train between two stations, and the driver of a goods train, acting upon the supposition that he was signalled by an inspector to slacken speed, shut off steam, and reduced his speed from twenty miles an hour to four miles an hour, and the defendant by this means was enabled to jump into the guard's van, and thereupon the train resumed its natural speed, and without stopping proceeded onward: Held, that the defendant had unlawfully obstructed the train within the meaning of the above section of the said statute. R. v. Hardy, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 278; 40 L. J. M. C. 62; Bovill, C.J., said: 'Upon the facts stated in this case there can be no doubt but that the defendant made a signal by holding up his arms in the mode used by inspectors of the line. He thereby made a signal to the driver of the train with the intention of inducing him to reduce the speed of his train, and the driver did so in consequence; so there can be no doubt but that he in one sense obstructed the train; but the question is raised whether s. 36 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97 did not contemplate a physical obstruction. If the words used had been "whosoever shall obstruct the line of railway," there might have been ground for that contention, but those are not the words used. S. 36 enacts that, "whoever by any unlawful act, or by any wilful omission or neglect, shall obstruct or cause to be obstructed any engine or carriage using any railway," &c. That section refers to acts of wilful omission or neglect, which shews that acts of physical obstruction of the line were not alone contemplated. That section seems rather to point to acts of servants which might effect the stoppage of the carriages of a train. But all doubt is removed by reference to s. 35, which provides against the maliciously doing certain acts which are enumerated to be placing objects upon the railway, removing part of a line, turning the points, and "making or shewing, hiding or removing, any signal, &c.," and "any other matter or thing" with intent to obstruct. The acts there enumerated are clearly not matters necessarily of physical obstruction. The acts contemplated by s. 36 must be taken to be ejusdem generis with those in s. 35; and the same construction must be put on both sections. "Any unlawful act" in s. 36 includes the acts mentioned in s. 35, therefore on that point this case is clear, and R. v. Hadfield was decided on the same principle. In that case, however, there was an alteration made of an actual fixed signal belonging to the line; but the words of this indictment following the statute are "by making a signal," which the defendant undoubtedly did, and therefore is within the statute. The two cases are not distinguishable.'

(o) Taken from 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15. In place of the words in italics that section had 'shall wilfully do or cause to be done anything in such manner as to.'

deliberately and intentionally or recklessly, as distinct from inadvertently or accidentally (qq).

Upon an indictment on 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15 (r), it appeared that the railway was constructed under an Act of Parliament, and was intended for the conveyance of passengers in carriages drawn by steam, but that at the time of the offence the conveyance of passengers for hire had not commenced, and the traffic was confined to the carriage of materials and workmen. A railway truck was placed by the prisoners across the railway so as to obstruct the passage of any carriage and endanger the safety of persons conveyed therein, but its position was discovered, and it was removed before any collision occurred; it was objected that the case was not within the statute—1st, because the railway was not used for the conveyance of passengers for hire; 2ndly, because no actual obstruction took place. On a case reserved, it was held that the case was within the statute. It must be assumed that the railway was completed, and that all that required to be done was to open it for the public traffic. The case came within both branches of the section; there was an obstruction put on the line by the prisoners, and it was put in such a position so as to endanger the safety of the persons conveyed. It was contended that there could be no obstruction until some train were absolutely obstructed; but such a construction could not be maintained. The object of the legislature was obviously to prevent any disaster to those using the railway, and to punish those who put obstructions in such a manner as was likely to cause such disaster. The case was, therefore, within the intention of the statute; and though, in the ordinary course of things, it would generally be after the railway was fully opened that the public required to be protected, yet an obstruction before that time was within the mischief as well as the words of the statute (s).

On an indictment on 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15 (r), for throwing a stone upon a railway in such a manner as thereby to endanger the safety of one G. C. and of divers other persons being conveyed on the engines and carriages then using the railway, it appeared that the defendant was on a bridge over the railway, and let drop a stone on a train that was passing; the stone was a thin flat stone, and the train was travelling at the rate of about fifteen miles an hour. The railway was opened in January, 1845, but no Act of Parliament was obtained until the July following. It was objected that this railway was not constructed under an Act of Parliament, but Alderson, B., held that the effect of the definition of railway in the interpretation clause (t), was to extend and not to weaken the effect of sect. 15 (u). And he told the jury, 'there are two propositions for you to consider:—First, did the defendant wilfully cast or drop this stone on the railway? and secondly, did the casting that stone on the railway in the manner in which it was cast endanger the safety of any of the persons travelling on the railway at that time? If you are satisfied on both these points, he is guilty. If the defendant had this stone in his hand at the time when the train was passing, and it dropped accidentally from his hand on the railway, you should acquit him ; for that which occurs by accident cannot be said to be wilful. Should you think that the defendant did cast the stone on the railway wilfully, the next question is, was it cast there by him under such circumstances as to endanger the safety of G. C., the guard, the engineer, or any of the passengers or persons in the carriages ? Now that would depend very much on the rate at which the train was proceeding at the time, and the weight and the size of the stone dropped. The former is material, because it is the same thing whether I throw a stone at your head or you run your head against the stone. If, therefore, the train were coming along at the rate of fifteen miles an hour, it would strike with that velocity a stone that meets it. You might drop a stone on a broad-wheeled waggon without doing any harm ; but it may be very different when you drop it on a machine going at an enormous rate. Suppose a passenger in this train, going at the rate of fifteen miles an hour, had put his head out of the window, or the guard were to do so, which his duty might render necessary, a blow from a stone of this size and weight certainly might endanger his safety.' The jury found that the defendant foolishly dropped the stone on the railway, but not with the intention of doing any injury ; Alderson, B. : ' The intention of the prisoner in dropping the stone is not the question. It is, " did he purposely drop the stone on the railway, and would the effect of the stone's being so dropped be to endanger the safety of the persons on the railway ? "' (v).

Where on an indictment under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15, it appeared that large quantities of earth and rubbish were found placed across the railway, and the prosecutor's case was that this had been done by the defendant wilfully and in order to obstruct the use of the railway ; and the defendant's case was, that the earth and rubbish had been accidentally dropped on the railway ; Maule, J., told the jury that if the rubbish had been dropped on the rails by mere accident, the defendant was not guilty ; but ' it was by no means necessary, in order to bring the case within this Act, that the defendant should have thrown the rubbish on the rails expressly with the view to upset the train of carriages. If the defendant designedly placed these substances, having a tendency to produce an obstruction, not caring whether they actually impeded the carriages or not, that was a case within the Act.' And on the jury asking ' what was the meaning of the term "wilfully" used in the statute ? ' the learned judge added, ' he should consider the act to have been wilfully done, if the defendant intentionally placed the rubbish on the line, knowing that it was a substance likely to produce an obstruction ; if, for instance, he had done so in order to throw upon the company's officers the necessary trouble of removing the rubbish ' (w).

In another case upon 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 15, it was strongly intimated that the neglect of a driver and stoker of an engine to keep a good look-out for signals, according to the rules of the railway company, whereby a collision occurred, and the safety of the passengers endangered, was not an offence within the section (x). But such neglect may come within the words of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 36, or 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 34, ante, p. 873, or both, ante, p. 874.

On an indictment under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 6 (y), for maliciously placing a stone upon a railway with intent to obstruct the carriages travelling thereon, it appeared that the prisoners, two boys, were seen to go upon the railway, and whilst one held the lever by which the points were turned, so as to separate two portions of the rails, the other dropped a stone between them, so as to keep them separated; the result would have been, had the act not been detected, that the carriages would have been thrown off the rail. No motive was suggested except that of wanton mischief. The jury were told that it was not necessary that the prisoners should have entertained any feeling of malice against the railway company or against any person travelling upon it; it was quite enough to support the charge if the act was done mischievously and with a view to cause an obstruction of a train (z).

The prisoner was indicted under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, ss. 6, 7 (a), for maliciously throwing a torch at a railway truck with intent in one count to injure it, in another to endanger the safety of persons travelling in the truck; there was, however, no one on the truck upon which the prisoner let the torch fall; and Channell, B., held that there was no evidence to support the second count (b).

On an indictment under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 7 (a), for maliciously throwing a stone into a railway carriage with intent to endanger the safety of any person in it, it appeared that there had been considerable popular excitement against a person who was about to travel by the train, and there was a crowd assembled at the time of its departure, and the prisoner had thrown a stone intending to hit him, but without any previous ill-will. It was urged that the statute did not apply; its objects was to protect passengers by railways, and not to afford any additional protection against common assaults. Erle, J., after consulting Williams, J., said: 'Looking at the preamble of the sections relating to this class of offences, which recites that it is "expedient to make further provision for the punishment of aggravated assaults," and looking also to the provision of these clauses as indicated by the terms of sect. 6, immediately preceding the section upon which this indictment is framed, I consider that the "intent to endanger the safety of any person" travelling on the railway, spoken of in both sections, must appear to have been an intent to inflict some grievous bodily harm, and such as would sustain an indictment for assaulting or wounding a person with intent to do some grievous bodily harm ; but as that is a question of degree, which it is impossible to define further than in those terms, it must be a question for the jury, upon the facts, whether there has been such an intent ' ; and his lordship directed the jury, that ' in order to convict the prisoner they must be satisfied that he intended to inflict on the person at whom he aimed some grievous bodily harm ' (c).

Now, this is an error, for s. 8 has nothing to do with railway carriages, but only with railway buildings, and it is quite clear that s. 6, 7, include everything whatsoever that is used with any of the intents therein mentioned.

(c) R. v. Rooke, 1 F. & F. 107. ' This case does not appear to have been argued on the part of the Crown, and, with all deference to the very learned judges, it clearly proceeded on a mistake. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, contained a number of enactments which had no bearing whatever on each other ; the Act was framed to provide for totally different matters, which at that time called for a remedy for each. Ss. 1 and 2 related to persons found by night with intent to commit felonies. S. 3 related to administering chloroform. S. 4 and 5 related to aggravated assaults. Then ss. 6, 7 and 8 were railway clauses, and it is perfectly clear that, although a person who committed an offence within either s. 6 or s. 7, may commit an assault, it was not essential to prove an assault in any offence contained in them, and no indictment upon them ever does allege an assault. They were most carefully framed for the very purpose of including every case where there was an " intent to injure or endanger the safety of any person " ; and those words were selected as much more general than " with intent to do grievous bodily harm." It is also a fallacy to suppose that, even if the sections were to be construed together, s. 4 warrants this decision ; for though one branch of it is " inflict any grievous bodily harm," the other is " cut, stab, or wound " without any aggravation ; so that a wound, however slight, and given without any intention to inflict grievous bodily harm, is within the section. Every indictment must allege the intent to be to injure or endanger the safety of some person, and it is very confidently submitted that the only proper question to be left to the jury in every case is, did the defendant do the act with intent to injure or endanger the safety of that person ? CHAPTER THE SIXTH.

OF ASSAULT AND BATTERY.

SECT. I.—DEFINITION AND PUNISHMENT.

MANY of the crimes classed as offences against the person involve assault and battery.

An assault is an attempt or offer to apply force of any kind to another person, by striking, touching, or moving him or otherwise applying any direct or indirect force to him : as by striking at another with a stick or other weapon, or without a weapon, though the party striking misses his aim. So, drawing a sword or bayonet, or even holding up a fist in a menacing manner, throwing a bottle or glass with intent to wound or strike, presenting a gun at a person who is within the distance to which the gun will carry, pointing a pitchfork at a person who is within reach, or any other similar act, accompanied with such circumstances as denote at the time an intention, coupled with an actual or apparent present ability, of using actual force against the person of another, will amount to an assault (a).

The Queensland Criminal Code, 1899 (b), appears correctly to embody the common law in saying that force in the definition of assault and battery includes light, heat, electrical force, gas, odour, or any other substance or thing whatever if applied in such a degree as to cause injury or personal discomfort.

No words, however provoking, can amount to an assault (c). Words used at the time of the transaction may so explain the intention of the party as to qualify his act, and prevent it from being deemed an assault. Thus where A. laid his hand upon his sword, and said, 'If it were not assize-time, I would not take such language from you,' it was held not to be an assault, on the ground that he did not design to do the other party any corporal hurt at that time, and that a man's intention must operate with his act in constituting an assault (d).

The threat or attempt must be of immediate and not of future or contingent injury.

If a person presents a pistol, purporting to be a loaded pistol, so near as to produce danger to life if the pistol had gone off, it is an assault in point of law, although in fact the pistol is unloaded. Parke, B., said : 'My idea is, that it is an assault to present a pistol at all, whether loaded or not. If you threw the powder out of the pan, or took the percussion cap off, and said to the party this is an empty pistol, then that would be no assault, for there the party must see that it was not possible that he should be injured ; but if a person presents a pistol which has the appearance of being loaded, and puts the party into fear and alarm, that is what it is the object of the law to prevent (e).

However, where in an action for assault and presenting a loaded pistol at the plaintiff, it appeared that the defendant cocked a pistol, and presented it at the plaintiff's head, and said that if he was not quiet he would blow his brains out ; but there was no evidence that the pistol was loaded, Abinger, C.B., held, that if the pistol was not loaded it would be no assault (f). And in another case Tindal, C.J., ruled in the same way (g).

Pointing a loaded gun at half-cock at a person is an assault ; for there is a present ability of doing the act threatened, as the gun can be cocked in an instant (h).

It is not every threat, where there is no actual personal violence, that constitutes an assault ; there must, in all cases, be the means or present capacity of carrying the threat into effect. If, therefore, a man is advancing in a threatening attitude, e.g. with his fist clenched, to strike another, so that his blow would almost immediately have reached such person, and is then stopped, it is an assault in law, if his intent were to strike the other man, though he was not near enough at the time to have struck him (i).

Where the plaintiff was in the defendant's workshop and refused to leave it, and the defendant and his workmen surrounded him, and tucking up their sleeves and aprons, threatened to break his neck, if he did not go out, and fearing that the men would strike him if he did not do so, the plaintiff went out ; it was held that this was an assault ; for there was a threat of violence exhibiting an intention to assault, and a present ability to carry the threat into execution (j).

(e) R. v. St. George, 9 C. & P. 483, 490. R. v. St. George is over-ruled on another point by R. v. Duckworth [1892], 2 Q.B. 83, ante, p. 842.

(f) Blake v. Barnard, 9 C. & P. 626. See also an anonymous case, cor. Erskine, J., cited by Ludlow, Serjt., 9 C. & P. 492. It seems that a very reasonable distinction might be made in cases of this kind. If a person presents a gun at another, knowing it not to be loaded, there can be no intent to injure in any event, and therefore he ought not to be criminally responsible ; but if the person, at whom such an unloaded gun was presented did anything in self-defence, his justification, whether in a civil or criminal proceeding, ought to be just the same as if the gun were loaded ; for the act of the party presenting the gun led to the natural consequence that the party at whom it was presented should defend himself, and the party presenting the gun ought not to be permitted to shew the facts to be otherwise than he had himself held them out to be. C. S. G.

AMERICAN NOTE.

Bishop (Amer. Crim. Law, ii. 32) agrees with the doctrine in R. v. St. George, rather than with that of Blake v. Barnard and R. v. James.

The plaintiff was walking on a footpath by a roadside, and the defendant, who was on horseback, rode after him at a quick pace ; the plaintiff then ran away into his own garden, and the defendant rode up to the gate, and shook his whip at the plaintiff, who was about three yards off ; it was held, that if the defendant rode after the plaintiff, so as to compel him to run into his garden for shelter to avoid being beaten, it was an assault (k).

Battery.—A battery involves something more than an attempt to apply force to another person ; but any force whatsoever, be it ever so small, being actually applied to the person of a man adversely (i.e. without his consent), in an angry or revengeful, or rude or insolent manner, such as spitting in his face, or in any way touching him in anger, or violently jostling him out of the way, or throwing water over him, is a battery in law (l). For the law cannot draw the line between different degrees of violence, and, therefore, totally prohibits the first and lowest stage of it ; every man's person being sacred, and no other having a right to meddle with it in any the slightest manner (m). Every battery includes an assault (n).

To cut a man's clothes whilst on his person is an assault, although there is no intention to inflict any bodily injury, and in the ordinary case of a blow on the back there is clearly an assault, though the blow is received by the coat on the person (o).

Where a policeman was stationed at a door to prevent a person from entering, it was held that, if he was entirely passive, like a door or a wall put to prevent that person from entering that room, and simply obstructing the entrance of that person, no assault was committed (p).

The injury need not be effected directly by the hand of the party. Thus there may be an assault by encouraging a dog to bite ; by riding over a person with a horse ; or by wilfully and violently driving a cart, &c., against the carriage of another person, and thereby causing bodily injury to the persons travelling in it (q). It is not necessary that the assault should be immediate ; thus where a defendant threw a lighted squib into a market place, which being tossed from hand to hand by different persons, at last hit the plaintiff in the face, and put out his eye, it was adjudged that this was actionable as an assault and battery (r). And the same has been held where a person pushed a drunken man against another, who was thereby hurt (s), but if such person intended doing a right act, as to assist the drunken man, or to prevent him from going along the street without help, and in so doing a hurt ensued, he would not be answerable (t).

For an assault or battery to be criminal it must be (1) intentional and not merely accidental, (2) without legal justification or excuse, and (3) committed without the consent of the person assaulted or struck, or under circumstances which make consent no defence by reason of the youth or mental incapacity of the person assaulted or because the consent is extorted by fraud or force or is otherwise not really given, or is not by law allowed to be given.

Intention. Accident.—It is not an assault or battery to lay a hand gently on another without hostile intention, but merely to attract his attention (u), nor, it is said, to lay hands gently on a man against whom a warrant is out and to tell the officer holding the warrant that that is the man wanted (v).

It has been held not to be an actionable trespass to the person when a beater was wounded by a shot which glanced off a tree (w). This rule excluding civil liability in such a case applies à fortiori to criminal liability.

If one soldier accidentally hurts another by discharging a gun in exercise, it is not a battery (x). And it is no battery if, by a sudden fright, a horse runs away with his rider, and runs against a man (y). So where upon an indictment for throwing down skins into a man's yard, being a public way, by which a person's eye was beaten out, it appeared by the evidence that the wind blew the skin out of the way, and that the injury was caused by this circumstance, the defendants were acquitted (z).

Accident is not a defence when the defendant meaning to strike one person and unintentionally strikes another person. Thus if one of two persons, who are fighting, strikes at the other, and hits a third person unintentionally, this is a battery, and cannot be justified on the ground that it was accidental (a).

And upon the principles which have been before mentioned, such an act in a third person, causing death to any one, may, under certain circumstances, amount to felony. Ante, p. 781. The plaintiff was walking along a public street when the defendant seated on the box of his carriage, which was drawn by two horses and driven by a man then under his control, came down a cross street. The horses, frightened by the barking of a dog, ran away. The driver was unable to hold them in, but told the defendant to leave them to him. The defendant accordingly sat passive, while the driver, trying to turn the horses so as to prevent them from running into a shop window opposite, pulled them aside towards the spot where the plaintiff then happened to be; but, on nearing her, endeavoured vainly to draw them away from her. They ran against her, and she being hurt, sued the defendant for negligence, and trespass. The jury found the defendant free from negligence, and that the occurrence was mere accident. The prisoner, in striking at a man with whom he had been fighting, struck and wounded a woman beside him. He was indicted for unlawfully and maliciously wounding the woman. The jury found that the blow was unlawful and malicious, but the striking of the woman was purely accidental, and not such a consequence of the blow as the prisoner ought to have expected. The prisoner was convicted, and it was held that the conviction was right (b).

Justification of the Use of Force.—The use of force against the person of another without his assent is in certain cases lawful, e.g. where the force is used (a) in the due execution of the law, (b) in lawful correction, (c) in defence of person or property.

Lawful Arrest.—The right to use force is correlative to the right to arrest, whether with or without written warrant from a judicial officer (c).

If an officer of justice has a warrant for the arrest of a man who will not suffer himself to be arrested, the officer may lay hands on the person to be arrested and use such force as is necessary to effect the arrest. And it may be lawful to lay hands on a man in order to serve civil process upon him (d).

The force used is limited to that necessary for the purpose of effecting the object in view, and if there is an excess of violence the officer is guilty of assault (e). Where one of the marshals of the City of London, whose duty it was on the day of a public meeting in Guildhall, to see that a passage was kept for the transit of the carriages of the members of the corporation and others, directed a person in the front of the crowd to stand back, and on being told by him that he could not for those behind him, struck him immediately on the face, saying, that he would make him, it was held that a more moderate degree of pressure ought to have been exercised, and some little time given to remove the party in a more peaceable way, and that consequently the marshal had been guilty of a too violent exertion of his authority (f).

An officer having a warrant to search for an illegal still in the defendant's house, the defendant asked to see the warrant, and it was given him, and he then refused to return it, upon which the officer endeavoured by force to retake it, and a scuffle ensued, it was held that the officer was justified in using so much violence as was necessary to retake the warrant, and no more (g).

defence under the general issue; but that a defence which admits that the accident resulted from an act of the defendant must be pleaded. In an action for assault, where the defendant had thrown a stick, and hit the plaintiff, but it did not appear that he threw the stick with the intention of hitting the plaintiff; Rolfe, B., is reported to have held that this was not sufficient to constitute an assault, as it did not appear for what purpose the stick was thrown; and it was therefore fair to conclude that it was thrown for a proper purpose, and that the striking of the plaintiff was merely accidental. Alderson v. Waistell, 1 C. & K. 358. But this ruling may well be doubted, at all events as far as relates to a civil suit. See ante, p. 882, note (x). C. S. G.

Latimer* the facts were that the prisoner meant to strike a pane of glass and hit a person by accident, it might have been that the malice shewn would be insufficient.

The justification extends to persons lawfully acting in aid of the peace officer and to private persons lawfully engaged in effecting an arrest, and extends to preventing the escape before or after arrest of the person to be arrested and to preventing his rescue from others. The causing of death or grievous bodily harm is justifiable in cases where the arrest is for felony (h).

Arrest by Railway Officer.—On an indictment for assaulting J. S., it appeared that the prisoner got into an empty third-class carriage proceeding from Manchester to Stoke-upon-Trent, and got out on the wrong side at North Road Station, and being asked by the guard for his ticket, he said he had none, and had intended to get out at the station for Crewe. No other demand was made on the prisoner; but the guard ordered him to get into a second-class carriage, and locked the doors. The train then proceeded to Stoke, a distance of several miles. The prisoner, on getting out, was asked for his ticket; and on his not producing it, the second-class fare from Manchester to Stoke was demanded. It not being paid, the policeman at the station collared the prisoner, who gave him a blow and got away. He was pursued and retaken, when he cut the policeman's hand. The reason alleged for bringing the prisoner to Stoke was, that it was the headquarters of the railway authorities, and there was no mode of dealing with the prisoner at the North Road Station. Wightman, J., told the jury (after stating the facts that occurred at the North Road Station), 'the guard, instead of then taking him on the specific charge of going so far without his ticket, which perhaps he might have done, takes him in a second-class carriage to Stoke, several miles out of the way. A ticket from Manchester to Stoke is there demanded and afterwards the full fare. It seems to me that this is clearly beyond the law, and that the railway authorities had no right to demand the fare from North Road to Stoke. I do not give any opinion as to the right to convey a person refusing to produce his ticket at one station on to another, on the charge of not paying his fare for that part of the journey which the prisoner had voluntarily and fraudulently performed; but whatever might have been the situation of the parties, if, on demand and refusal of the ticket or fare at North Road, the charge was there made, and he had been conveyed to Stoke for the purpose of dealing with it; here, the arrest being for non-payment of the fare to Stoke, the apprehension was illegal, and the prisoner had a right to resist it' (i).

Lawful Correction.—A parent may chastise his child (j), a school-master his pupil (k), and a master his apprentice (l), if the chastisement is moderate in the manner, the instrument, and the quality, and the child is old enough to appreciate correction (m). But an upper-servant cannot justify beating an under-servant for disobedience to orders (n).

The infliction of corporal punishment under the lawful sentence of a competent Court (o) is of course justifiable, if the punishment does not exceed the number of stripes prescribed by the sentence and is inflicted with the prescribed or a lawful instrument (p).

Use of Force by Commanders of Ships.—Officers of a ship, whether of the Royal Navy (q) or the merchant service (r), appear not now to be entitled to inflict corporal punishment, in port or at sea, on any of the crew, for disobedience to orders, or for any cause (s), except in the case of ship's boys in the Royal Navy (t), or apprentices to the sea service (tt). But the captain can justify the use for the purpose of maintaining good order and discipline on the ship, such force as he believes on reasonable grounds to be necessary and as is under the circumstances reasonable.

It was held in an old case that a defendant may justify even a mayhem, if done by him as an officer in the army, for disobeying orders; and that he may give in evidence the sentence of a council of war, upon a petition against him by the plaintiff; and that if, by the sentence, the petition is dismissed, it will be conclusive evidence in favour of the defendant (u).

Where parish officers, by force and against her consent, cut off the hair of a young woman who was an inmate of a workhouse, it was held an assault (v).

Consent.—The person assaulted may be too young to appreciate the nature of the act done or to do more than submit without actually consenting to it; and submission by a child in the hands of an older and stronger person and possibly acting under fear or a sense of constraining authority is not equivalent to consent. Where two boys of eight years of age submitted to indecent acts on the part of a grown-up man in ignorance of the nature of the acts to be done and done, the man was held to be rightly convicted of an indecent assault (w).

By the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 45), in the case of an indecent assault on a child of either sex under thirteen, it is no defence that he or she consented (x).

Fraud.—A consent obtained by fraud, or threats, or violence, is no answer to proceedings for assault. Where the defendants told the mother of a child of which she had been delivered that it was to be taken to a nursery or institution to be brought up, and they put the child in a bag and hung it upon some park-pales at the side of a footpath, and it was likely that the putting a child of so tender an age into a bag and hanging the bag on the pales would cause its death; Tindal, C.J., held that the defendants were guilty of an assault; for the mother gave consent in reliance on the pretence that the child was to be taken to some institution, and as that pretence was false, it was no consent at all (y).

Criminal responsibility for the use of any means intended to cause death nor to the doing of any act which is in itself an offence against the law, is not removed by the consent of the person on whom they are used, to the use of the means (z). The same rule applies as to the use of force likely to cause death or serious hurt, if used with knowledge of the consequences likely to ensue and with indifference and recklessness as to whether death or serious injury would ensue (a).

Consent may be given to acts done in the regular course of a lawful game (b), such as cricket or football, which, apart from consent, would be assault. Thus if two, by consent, play at cudgels, or singlestick, or wrestling, and one happens to hurt the other, it would not amount to a battery, as their intent was lawful and commendable, in promoting courage and activity (c). In playing such games disregard of the rules might afford evidence of hostile intent or recklessness, or that the act done was not of the class of act consented to by the person struck (d).

But this rule does not extend to protect persons who give blows in a duel with dangerous weapons (e), or in fencing with naked swords (f), nor in a fight by consent, whether for a prize or not (g), nor where the force used is such as to involve a breach of the public peace, and to affect the public as well as the person struck (h). And where a prize or other fight takes place, and a number of persons are assembled to witness it, if they have gone thither for the purpose of seeing the combatants strike each other, and were present when they did so, they are all in point of law guilty of an assault; and there is no distinction between those who concur in the act and those who fight (i); and it is not at all material which party struck the first blow, for if several are in concert, encouraging one another and co-operating, they are all equally guilty, though one only committed the actual assault (j). And if persons are voluntarily

In 1 East, P.C. 269, it is said: In cases of friendly contests with weapons, which though not of a deadly nature may breed danger, there should be due warning given that each party may start upon equal terms. For if two were engaged to play at cudgels and the one made a blow at the other likely to hurt before he was on his guard and without warning and death ensued, the want of due and friendly warning would make such act amount to manslaughter.

present, the mere presence unexplained may, it seems, afford some evidence for the consideration of the jury, although voluntarily presence would not of itself be necessarily conclusive evidence of an assault (k).

In the case of dangerous exhibitions and performances, the question may arise as to how far consent can be given to acts involving danger to the life or limb of the person consenting. This is settled as to males under sixteen and females under eighteen, by the Dangerous Performances Acts, 1879 and 1897, post, p. 910.

Consent to a surgical operation frees the operator from criminal responsibility for assault, when freely given with knowledge of the purpose of the operation and when the purpose is lawful and the operation is performed with professional skill. And the trend of legal opinion is in favour of the proposition that no criminal responsibility is incurred by a surgeon who, with proper care and skill, and for the physical benefit of a sick person, performs on him a surgical operation even without his consent (l).

Defence of Person or Property.—The use of force is lawful for the necessary defence of self or others or of property; but the justification is limited by the necessity of the occasion and the use of unnecessary force is an assault (m).

Thus if one confines a friend who is mad, and binds him, &c., in such a manner as is proper in such circumstances; or if a man forces a sword from one who offers to kill another therewith; or if a man gently lays his hands upon another, and thereby stays him from inciting a dog against a third person; he cannot be indicted for assault or battery (n). So if A. beats B. (without wounding him, or throwing at him a dangerous weapon), who is wrongfully endeavouring, with violence, to dispossess him of his lands, or of the goods, either of himself or of any other person, which have been delivered to him to be kept, and will not desist upon A.'s laying his hands gently upon him, and disturbing him. And if a man beats, wounds, or maims one who is making an assault upon his own person, or that of his wife, parent, child, or master; or if a man fights with, or beats, one who attempts to kill any stranger; in these cases also it seems that the party may justify the assault and battery (o), and a wife may justify an assault in defence of her husband (p).

With respect to assaults by a master in defence of his servant, Lord Mansfield said: 'I cannot say that a master interposing, when his servant is assaulted, is not justifiable under the circumstances of the case; as well

The proposition contains no direct reference to the consent or dissent of the patient. It is accepted as the law by Sir J. F. Stephen (Dig. Cr. L. (6th ed.), Art. 226). as a servant interposing for his master ; it rests on the relation between master and servant' (g).

Son assault demesne is a good defence to an indictment for assault and battery (r). If one man strikes another a blow, or does that which amounts to an assault on him, that other has a right to defend himself, and to strike a blow in his defence without waiting till he is struck (rr), but he has no right to revenge himself ; and if when all danger is past he strikes a blow not necessary for his defence, he commits an assault and battery (s). It is not, however, every trifling assault that will justify a grievous and immediate mayhem, such as cutting off a leg or hand, or biting off a joint of a man's finger ; unless it happen accidentally, without any cruel or malignant intention, or after the blood was heated in the scuffle, but it must appear that the assault was in some degree proportionable to the mayhem (t). If a party raise up a hand against another, within a distance capable of the latter being struck, the other may strike in his own defence, to prevent him, but he must not use a greater degree of force than is necessary (u). For if the violence used be more than was necessary to repel the assault, the party may be convicted of an assault (v).

It should be observed, with respect to an assault by a man on a party endeavouring to dispossess him of his land, that where the injury is a mere breach of a close, in contemplation of law, the defendant cannot justify a battery without a request to depart ; but it is otherwise where any actual violence is committed, as it is lawful in such case to oppose force to force : therefore, if a person break down the gate, or come into a close vi et armis, the owner need not request him to be gone, but may lay hands on him immediately ; for it is but returning violence with violence (w). If a person enters another's house with force and violence, the owner of the house may justify turning him out (using no more force than is necessary), without a previous request to depart : but if the person enters quietly, the other party cannot justify turning him out without a previous request (x). For 'there is a manifest distinction between endeavouring to turn a man out of a house or close into which he has previously entered quietly, and resisting a forcible attempt to enter : in the first case a request is necessary ; in the latter not ' (y). So, if one come forcibly and take away another's goods, the owner may oppose him at once, for there is no time to make a request (z). And the owner of goods (or his servant, acting by his command) which are wrongfully in the possession of another, may, after requesting him to deliver them up, justify an assault in order to repossess himself of them (a). It seems also that a person who has a right of way or other easement may justify using so much force as may be necessary to enable him to exercise that right; or to prevent another from interrupting it (b). But, in general, unless there be violence in the trespass, a party should not, either in defence of his person, or his real or personal property, begin by striking the trespasser, but should request him to depart or desist; and, if that is refused, should gently lay his hands upon him in the first instance, and not proceed with greater force than is made necessary by resistance (c). Thus, where a churchwarden justified taking off the hat of a person who wore it in church, at the time of divine service, the plea stated that he first requested the plaintiff to be uncovered, and that the plaintiff refused (d). And in all cases where the force used is justified, under the particular circumstances of the case, it must appear that it was not greater than was reasonably necessary to accomplish the lawful purpose intended to be effected (e). Therefore, though an offer to strike the defendant, first made by the prosecutor, is a sufficient assault by him to justify the defendant in striking, without waiting till the prosecutor had actually struck him first; yet, even a prior assault will not justify a battery, if such battery be extreme; and it will be matter of evidence, whether the retaliation of the defendant were excessive, and out of all proportion to the necessity or provocation received (f).

(w) Green v. Goddard, 2 Salk. 641. In a case of this kind, however, it should seem that the violence must be considerable, and continuing, in order to justify the application of force by the owner, without some previous request to depart ; at least, if the force applied be more than would be justified under a molliter manus imposuit : for in a case of assault and battery, where the defendant pleaded son assault demesne, and the plaintiff replied that he was possessed of a certain close, and that the defendant broke the gate and chased his horses in the close, and that he, for the defending his possession, molliter insultum fecit upon the defendant, the replication was adjudged to be bad ; and that it should have been molliter manus imposuit, as the plaintiff could not justify an assault in defence of his possession. Leward v. Baseley, 1 Ld. Raym. 62. Bull. (N. P.), 19.

Procedure.—Except in the cases falling within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 44, 45 (post, pp. 897, 898), the person assaulted may take both civil and criminal proceedings against his assailant; for the penalty imposed in the criminal prosecution, and the damages to the party in the civil action, are perfectly distinct in their nature (g), but the Court of Queen's Bench refused to sentence a party convicted of an assault while an action was pending for the same assault (h).

There is no objection to including assaults on two persons in the same indictment (if they were committed as part of the same transaction) (i), nor to inserting several counts in the same indictment

(i) The reason for the rule is that assault for distinct assaults, and it has long been the constant practice to receive evidence of several assaults upon the same indictment (j); nor is there any objection to an indictment charging an assault by two persons jointly. On such indictment either or both may be convicted according to the evidence (k). 'Cannot the King call a man to account for a breach of the peace, because he broke two heads instead of one?' (l).

Pleas.—Whatever is a legal justification or excuse for an assault or imprisonment, such as son assault demesne, the arrest of a felon, &c., may, upon an indictment, be given in evidence under the general issue (m).

As every battery includes an assault (n), it follows, that on an indictment of assault and battery, in which the assault is ill laid, if the defendant be found guilty of the battery it is sufficient (o).

Wherever a count for a misdemeanor contains a charge of assault accompanied with circumstances of greater or less aggravation, the jury may find the defendant guilty of a common assault, and acquit him of the circumstances of aggravation (p).

Punishment.—By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 47 (q), 'Whosoever shall be convicted upon an indictment of any assault occasioning actual bodily harm (r) shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude . . . (s), and whosoever shall be convicted upon an indictment for a common assault shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding a misdemeanor only; and that the prosecutor is not, as in felony, required to elect on which count he will proceed. But if the joinder embarrass the defence the Court can quash the indictment or sever the trial of the counts.

(k) In two cases included in the sixth edition of this work, Vol. iii. pp. 317, 318, rulings are reported which seem to be incorrect and misleading. In the first, R. v. Troughton, 1 Cox, 197, on an indictment against two defendants for committing an assault, the prosecution proved an assault committed by one, with which the other had nothing to do, and it was urged that the latter was entitled to be acquitted, as an assault answering the description of that in the indictment had been proved, and, as there was only one count, more than one assault could not be proved; and it was held that the latter must be acquitted, on the ground that the assault proved was not the assault charged. It was then objected, for the other defendant, that as the count was for a joint assault, this defendant could not be convicted of an assault by him alone, and that he only came prepared to answer that joint assault; and it was held by Bullock, Commr., after consulting the Recorder of London, that this defendant must be acquitted. 'The second ruling is clearly wrong, and the two rulings are inconsistent.' C. S. G. In R. v. Gordon, 1 Cox, 259, on an indictment containing one count for an assault against two persons, an assault by one was proved, in which the other was not at all implicated, it was held by the same judge that one assault to which the indictment was applicable having been proved, evidence of other assaults could not be gone into. Mr. Greaves on this case says: 'This ruling is directly contrary to the second ruling in the last case. The point is not a question of law: it is merely a question for the discretion of the Court, and as any number of assaults may be tried under one indictment containing a count for each, there seems no good reason for confining the evidence on one count to the first assault that may happen to be proved. Stante v. Prickett, 1 Camp. 437, was cited in support of the objection.'

SECT. II.—OF CERTAIN AGGRAVATED ASSAULTS.

Most crimes classed as offences against the person involving assault or battery have been dealt with under their more special titles. But there remain certain forms of assault which are punishable more severely than common assault by reason of some circumstance of aggravation, either from the place in which, or the person upon whom, the assault is committed, or else from the great criminality of the purpose or object intended to be effected, or the amount of personal injury inflicted.

In Churches and Churchyards.—As to assaults in churches and churchyards or on ministers of religion, vide ante, pp. 401–408.

In Royal Palaces.—By the ancient law before the Conquest, fighting in the King's palaces, or before the King's judges, was punished with death (w). 33 Hen. VIII. c. 12, provided severe punishment for all malicious strikings by which blood was shed within any of the King's palaces or houses, or any other house, at such time as the royal person happened to be there abiding; but these provisions were repealed in 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 1).

In Courts of Justice.—Striking in the King's superior courts of justice in Westminster Hall, or in any other place, while the Courts were sitting, whether the Court of Chancery, Exchequer, King's Bench, or Common Pleas, or before justices of assize, or Oyer and Terminer, was considered to be punishable even more severely than striking in the King's palace; perhaps for the reason that, those Courts being anciently held in the King's palace, and before the King himself, striking there included not merely contempt against the King's palace but something more, namely, the disturbance of public justice (x). So that, though striking in the King's palace was not punished with the loss of the offender's hand unless some blood were drawn, nor even then with the loss of lands and goods, the drawing of a weapon only upon a judge or justice in such Courts, though the party struck not, was regarded as a great 'misprision,' punishable by the loss of the right hand, perpetual imprisonment, and forfeiture of the party's lands during life, and of his goods and chattels (y). And a similar punishment might be inflicted on a man who, in the same Courts, and within their view, struck a juror or any other person, either with a weapon, or with hand, shoulder, elbow, or foot; but he was not deemed to be liable to such punishment if he made an assault only, and did not strike (z). And a man guilty of this offence could not excuse himself by shewing that the person so struck by him gave the first offence (a).

(t) The words in italics were new in 1861. The usual common-law punishment for assault was fine, imprisonment without hard labour and (or) the finding of sureties to keep the peace. See 4 Bl. Com. 217. 1 East, P.C. 406, 428.

The three first counts of an information set forth a special commission for the trial of O. and others for high treason; and that, pending the sessions, after the acquittal of O., and before any order or direction had been made by the Court for his discharge, the defendants, in open Court, &c., made a great riot, and riotously attempted to rescue him out of the custody of the sheriff, to whose custody he had been assigned by the justices and commissioners; and, the better to effect such rescue and escape, did, at the said sessions, in open Court, and in the presence of the said justices and commissioners, riotously, &c., make an assault on one J. R., beat, bruise, wound, and ill-treat the said J. R., and thereby impede and obstruct the said justices, &c. There were two other counts in the information; the one for riotously interrupting and obstructing the justices in the holding of the session, and the other for a common riot (b). Two of the defendants having been found guilty generally, considerable doubt was intimated by Lord Kenyon whether the Court were not bound to pass the judgment of amputation, &c., for the offence, as laid in the three first counts; and the matter stood over for consideration. But before the defendants were again brought up to receive judgment, the Attorney-General said that he had received the royal command and warrant under the sign manual, whereby he was authorised to enter a nolle prosequi as to those parts of the information on which any doubt had arisen, or might arise, whether the judgment thereon were discretionary in the Court, and pray judgment only on such charges as left the judgment in their discretion; and, accordingly, a nolle prosequi was entered on the three first counts; and on the others the Court gave judgment against the defendants, of fine, imprisonment, and sureties (c).

A person who rescues a prisoner from any of the Courts which have been mentioned, without striking a blow, is said to be punishable by perpetual imprisonment, and forfeiture of goods, and of the profits of lands during life; for this offence is, in its nature, similar to the other; but as it differs in this, that no blow is actually given, the amputation of the hand is excused (d). And for the like reason, an affray or riot near the said Courts, but out of their actual view, is said to be punishable by fine and imprisonment during pleasure, but not with the loss of the hand (e).

There has not since 1799 been any prosecution on indictment based on

R. 416, and the notes thereto, are various instances of the judgment having been executed to the fullest extent. One of them is remarkable for the speedy justice which appears to have been administered. 'Richardson,

Chief Justice of C. B., at the assizes at Salisbury, in the summer of 1631, was assaulted by a prisoner condemned there for felony, who, after his condemnation, threw a brickbat at the said judge, and which narrowly missed; and for this an indictment was immediately drawn by Noy against the prisoner, and his right arm cut off and fixed to the gibbet upon which he was himself immediately hanged in the presence of the Court.'

this antiquated view of the law (f). Assaults in Court are dealt with as contempts of the Court (ante, pp. 537 et seq.), or by indictment, and in the latter case the punishment meted out is that warranted by the Act of 1861.

It is said that, in order to warrant the higher judgment, the offence must be charged to have been committed in the presence of the King, or of the justices (g). And it seems also that in order to warrant such judgment, the indictment ought expressly to charge a stroke; though it does not appear whether any technical word would be necessary to be used for that purpose (h).

Superior Courts.—Though an assault in any of the King's inferior Courts of record did not subject the offender to lose his hand (i); yet, upon an indictment for such an assault, the circumstances under which it was committed would, doubtless, be considered as a matter of aggravation. And any affray or contemptuous behaviour in inferior Courts of record is summarily punishable as contempt of Court, by the judges there sitting (j), or where such offences are committed in a Court of summary jurisdiction by proceedings in the High Court (k).

As to assaults punishable as piracy see 11 Will. III. c. 7. s. 8, ante, p. 259; 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 88, s. 2, ante, p. 266.

Assault with intent to Commit Felony.—It is a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for not more than two years, to assault any person with intent to commit any felony (l). Assault with intent to commit murder (m), or robbery (n), are specially punishable, as are demands of property by menaces or force, with intent to steal (o). As to assaults with intent to ravish or to commit an unnatural offence, see post, pp. 942, 975.

Assaults on Officers of the Law.—By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 37 (p), 'Whosoever shall assault and strike or wound any magistrate, officer, or other person whatsoever lawfully authorised, in or on account of the exercise of his duty in or concerning the preservation of any vessel in distress, or of any vessel, goods, or effects wrecked, stranded, or cast on shore, or lying under water, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years' . . . (q).

(s) Upon an indictment, under this section, for assaulting police officers in the execution of their duty, it was objected that there was no offence, as the police were in plain clothes, and the defendants did not know they were constables; but it was held that the offence was not assaulting them, knowing them to be in the execution or shall assault any person with intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detainer of himself or of any other person for any offence, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour' (t).

By the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 101), s. 9, 'Where any person shall be charged with and convicted of any assault upon any officer of a workhouse or relieving officer in the due execution of his duty, or upon any person acting in aid of such officer, the Court may sentence the offender to the same punishment as is provided by law for an assault upon a peace officer (u), or revenue officer in the due execution of his duty' (v).

By the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 105), s. 18, the preceding clause was extended to 'an assault upon any person included under the word "officer" in the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834 (5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76), or upon any other person acting in his aid'; and by sect. 109 of the Act of 1834, the term 'officer' includes 'any clergyman, schoolmaster, person duly licensed to practise as a medical man, vestry clerk, treasurer, collector, assistant overseer, governor, master or mistress of a workhouse, or any other person who shall be employed in any parish or union in carrying this Act or the laws for the relief of the poor into execution, and whether performing one or more of the above-mentioned functions.'

By the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112), s. 12, where any person is convicted of any assault on any constable when in the execution of his duty, such person shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall, in the discretion of the Court, be liable to either pay a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, and in default of payment to be imprisoned with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding six months, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding six, or in case such person has been convicted of a similar assault within two years, nine months with or without hard labour.

By the Prevention of Crimes Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 75) s. 2, 'The provisions of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, s. 12, shall apply to all cases of resisting or wilfully obstructing (vv) any constable or peace officer when in the execution of his duty. Provided that in cases to which the said Act is extended by this Act, the person convicted shall not be liable to a greater penalty than five pounds, or in default of payment to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for a greater term than two months.'

of their duty, but assaulting them being in the execution of their duty. R. v. Forbes, 10 Cox, 362 (Russell Gurney, Recorder), approved in R. v. Maxwell, 73 J. P. 174.

(t) Taken from 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 25 (E) and 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 31 (I.). The section extends the former enactment to resisting and wilfully obstructing peace officers. Revenue officers were included in the former enactment, but are omitted in this, because assaults on them are provided for by 44 & 45 Vict. c. 12, s. 12, ante, p. 374; 53 & 54 Vict. c. 21, s. 11.

By 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 11 (w), any person whatsoever may apprehend any person who shall be found committing any indictable offence in the night, and may convey or deliver him to any constable or police officer in order to his being conveyed, as soon as reasonably may be, before a justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to law; and by sect. 12, 'If any person liable to be apprehended under the provisions of this Act, shall assault or offer any violence to any person by law authorised to apprehend or detain him, or to any person acting in his aid or assistance, every such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding three years.'

24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, sect. 38 is not limited to assaults on a peace officer, but extends—

(i) To persons acting in aid of such officer (in the due execution of his duty); and

(ii) To any person who is assaulted with intent to resist the lawful apprehension or detainer of the assailant or another for any offence (whether indictable or not).

Head (i) applies whether the duty being executed relates to civil or criminal matters; but head (ii) is limited to the case of lawful arrests for a criminal matter.

The expression 'in the execution of his duty,' includes all cases in which the constable at common law or by statute is lawfully seeking to make an arrest without warrant or with a warrant regular on the face of it, or to prevent the commission of crimes or breaches of the public peace (x), or to execute a search warrant, lawfully issued (y), or is lawfully detaining his prisoner or conveying him before a judicial officer (z), or is using reasonable precautions to prevent escape (a). He appears also to be in the execution of his duty in searching a person who is conducting himself with violence, to see if he has weapons about him (b), or in searching a person arrested on suspicion of larceny or unlawful possession.

Head (ii) applies to resistance to arrest by a private person authorised by common law or statute to effect the arrest.

The words 'peace officer in the due execution of his duty' are wide enough to include the sheriff or his officers, when concerned in executing civil process (c), and the bailiffs of County Courts (d). The words are not restricted to arrests for crime and are wide enough to cover acts relating to civil proceedings, e.g. the service of summonses relating to civil matters

SECT. III.—SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS FOR ASSAULT.

In the case of common or minor assaults, instead of proceeding by indictment, it is usual to resort to the alternative summary remedy provided by the following enactments.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 42, 'Where any person shall unlawfully assault or beat any other person, two justices of the peace, upon complaint by or on behalf of the party aggrieved (f), may hear and determine such offence, and the offender shall, upon conviction thereof before them, at the discretion of the justices, either be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two months (g) or else shall forfeit and pay such fine as shall appear to them to be meet, not exceeding, together with costs (if ordered), the sum of five pounds; and if such fine as shall be so awarded, together with the costs (if ordered), shall not be paid, either immediately after the conviction or within such period as the said justices shall at the time of the conviction appoint, they may commit the offender to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two months, unless such fine and costs be sooner paid' (h).

By sect. 43, 'When any person shall be charged before two justices of the peace with an assault or battery upon any male child whose age shall not in the opinion of such justices exceed fourteen years, or upon any female, either upon the complaint of the party aggrieved or otherwise, the said justices, if the assault or battery is of such an aggravated nature that it cannot in their opinion be sufficiently punished under the provisions

(e) R. v. Clark, 3 A. & E. 287. Much of this case turns on the authority of the collector under sections now repealed of the Land Tax Act, 1797 (37 Geo. III. c. 5).

(f) A prosecution under the section cannot be initiated by a police officer. Nicholson v. Booth, 57 L. J. M. C. 43. Cf. R. v. Wicklow JJ., 30 L. R. Ir. 633. But where the person assaulted, through age and infirmity, is in such a feeble state of health and so under the control of the assailant as to be incapable of instituting proceedings under this section, a third person may lay an information even though not in fact authorised by the party aggrieved. Pickering v. Willoughby [1907], 2 K.B. 296.

(g) Cumulative imprisonment for a period not exceeding in all six months may be imposed for several assaults committed on the same occasion. 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 18.

(h) Framed from 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 27. Under that section the complaint could only be made by the party aggrieved. R. v. Deny, 2 L. M. & P. 230. This section, in order to enable parents and others to complain on the part of an injured child, permits the complaint to be made by any one on its behalf, and so it might under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 92, s. 2 (1). Where a complaint has been made the justices may proceed, though the parties have made a compromise. R. v. Wiltshire, 8 L. T. 242. But see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 50, s. 9, which was passed for the very purpose of enabling justices in Ireland to proceed, even where the party assaulted declined to complain. By 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 27, the justices had only power to fine in the first instance; by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 92, s. 2, they may either fine or commit for two months; and under this clause they may either fine or commit. This clause also gives the justices power to commit to hard labour either in the first instance, or on default of payment of a fine. All summary proceedings under this section are taken under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, in England, and in Ireland under the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 93). The offences punishable under this and the next section are not offences as to which the accused can elect to be tried on indictment. See 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 17, ante, p. 17.

hereinbefore contained as to common assaults and batteries, may proceed to hear and determine the same in a summary way, and, if the same be proved, may convict the person accused; and every such offender shall be liable to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction, with or without hard labour, for any period not exceeding six months, or to pay a fine not exceeding (together with costs) the sum of twenty pounds, and in default of payment to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction for any period not exceeding six months, unless such fine and costs be sooner paid, and, if the justices shall so think fit, in any of the said cases, shall be bound to keep the peace and be of good behaviour for any period not exceeding six months from the expiration of such sentence' (i).

It would seem that the words 'aggravated nature' mean aggravated by circumstances of violence or the like, and do not apply to indecent assaults which are indictable and not punishable on summary conviction. A person charged under sect. 43 may be convicted under sect. 42 (j).

By sect. 44, 'If the justices upon the hearing of any such case of assault or battery upon the merits where the complaint was preferred by or on the behalf of the party aggrieved, under either of the last two preceding sections, shall deem the offence not to be proved, or shall find the assault or battery to have been justified, or so trifling as not to merit any punishment, and shall accordingly dismiss the complaint, and shall forthwith (k) make out a certificate (l) under their hands stating the fact of such dismissal, and shall deliver such certificate to the party against whom the complaint was preferred' (m).

(i) Taken from 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, s. 1. The provisions of 8 Edw. VII. c. 67, post, pp. 918 et seq., as to presumption of age, evidence, &c., apply to proceedings under ss. 42 & 43.

(j) See Stone, Justices' Manual (41st ed.), pp. 141-145.

(k) In R. v. Robinson, 12 A. & E. 672 (decided on the similar enactment, 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 27), it was held that the certificate must be given before the justices separated; but this was doubted in Thompson v. Gibson, 8 M. & W. 281. The act of granting the certificate is not judicial or discretionary, but ministerial only, and therefore 'forthwith' does not mean forthwith upon the dismissal of the complaint, but forthwith upon the demand of it by the person entitled to it. Costar v. Hetherington, 1 E. & E. 802. Hancock v. Somes, 1 E. & E. 795.

(l) The certificate must state on which of the three grounds the complaint was dismissed, Skuse v. Davis, 10 A. & E. 635; and must be specially pleaded in an action. Harding v. King, 6 C. & P. 427. The production of the certificate is sufficient evidence of the dismissal by the justices without proof of their signature or official character, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113, s. 1; and if the defendant appeared before the justices, the recital in the certificate of the fact of a complaint having been made, and of a summons having been issued, is sufficient evidence of those facts, without producing the complaint or summons. R. v. Westley, 11 Cox, 139.

(m) This section is limited to the case where a complaint is made by or on behalf of the party aggrieved. 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 27, only applied to a case where the complaint was made by the party aggrieved, and unless this clause had been limited as it is, any person who had committed an aggravated assault might have got some friend to make a complaint and get the case heard by the justices, on insufficient evidence, and might, by virtue of ss. 44 and 45, have deprived the party aggrieved of any remedy by action or indictment. Under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 27, where a party aggrieved made a complaint, and obtained a summons and served it on the defendant, but before the day for hearing, gave notice, both to the defendant not to attend, and to the magistrates' clerk that he should not attend, but the defendant attended, and claimed to have the information dismissed, and a certificate of dismissal granted, notwithstanding the prosecutor's absence, it was held that the justices were warranted in granting such certificate, and that it was a bar to an action of the assault. Tunncliffe v. Tedd, 5 C. B. 553. Vaughton v. Bradshaw, 9 C. B. (N. S.) 103. As to s. 44 these cases are no authority; for in order to

By sect. 45, 'If any person, against whom any such complaint as in either of the last three preceding sections mentioned shall have been preferred by or on the behalf of the party aggrieved, shall have obtained such certificate, or, having been convicted (n), shall have paid the whole amount adjudged to be paid, or shall have suffered the imprisonment or imprisonment with hard labour awarded, in every such case he shall be released from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause' (o).

By sect. 46, 'Provided, that in case the justices shall find (p) the assault or battery complained of to have been accompanied by any attempt to commit felony, or shall be of opinion that the same is, from any other circumstance, a fit subject for a prosecution by indictment, they shall abstain from any adjudication thereupon, and shall deal with the case in all respects in the same manner as if they had no authority finally to hear and determine the same: Provided also, that nothing herein contained shall authorise any justices to hear and determine any case of assault or battery in which any question shall arise as to the title (q) to any lands, obtain a certificate under it the case must be heard 'upon the merits'; that is, the decision of the justices must be after having heard the evidence. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93, s. 21 (1), required the justices to state in the certificate that the dismissal was on the merits, or that the assault was of a trifling or justifiable nature.

(n) Hartley v. Hindmarsh, L. R. 1 C. P. 353; 35 L. J. M. C. 255.

(o) Taken from 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 28 (E); and see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93, s. 21 (1). See the note to the last section. Several decisions occurred under the former enactment, whilst 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 11 (which authorised a conviction of an assault on an indictment for felony), was in force, as to the cases in which a plea of autrefois acquit and convict might be sustained, and these will be found, together with remarks upon them, in Greaves' Crim. Acts, p. 71 (2nd ed.); but as that enactment was repealed by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 10, there cannot now be a conviction of a common assault upon an indictment for felony (as to indecent assault, see post, p. 955); and it seems clear that autrefois acquit or convict by the common law cannot be pleaded in any case, unless the prisoner might be convicted on the former indictment, either of the whole or at least of a part of the criminal charge contained in it. See R. v. Walker, 2 M. & Rob. 446. See post, Vol. ii. p. 1982. In R. v. Eltrington, 1 B. & S. 688; 31 L. J. M. C. 14; 9 Cox, 86, the first count was for assaulting and doing grievous bodily harm to the prosecutor; the second for assaulting, and doing actual bodily harm to him; and the last for a common assault; and it was held that pleas of a dismissal of a complaint for the same assault under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 27, were a bar to the indictment, on the ground that the two first counts only charged the same assault with certain aggravations, and the last only charged the same assault. See R. v. Clare JJ. [1905], 2 Ir. Rep. 510.

It has been held that the words 'same cause' mean the same assault or same offence, and that the protection given by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 45, is not limited to proceedings for the same cause of action. Therefore a person who has been convicted of a common assault on a married woman, and who has paid the whole amount adjudged to be paid, may rely on the protection given by this section as a bar to an action against him by the husband, for the loss he, as such husband, has sustained by the assault on his wife. Masper v. Brown, 1 C. P. D. 97; 45 L. J. C. P. 203. Where a servant in the course of his employment commits an assault his release under the section does not exonerate his master. Dyer v. Munday [1895], 1 Q. B. 742.

(p) Where the defendant had been convicted of a common assault, though it was alleged that the evidence shewed a felonious assault, and a certiorari was moved for on the ground that the justices had no jurisdiction, the Court of Queen's Bench held that the justices had found that the assault was not 'accompanied by any attempt to commit felony,' which they had jurisdiction to determine, Lord Tenterden relying especially on the words 'in case the justices shall find the assault or battery to have been accompanied by any attempt to commit felony' in 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 29. Anon. 1 B. & Ad. 382. S. C. as R. v. Virgil, 1 Lew. 16. tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein or accruing therefrom, or as to any bankruptcy or insolvency, or any execution under the process of any Court of justice.'

The justices have jurisdiction under this section to commit for trial even where the prosecution is not by nor on behalf of the person assaulted (r).

Assaults by Husbands or Wives.—By the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39) s. 4, 'Any married woman whose husband who shall have been convicted summarily of an aggravated assault within the meaning of sect. 43 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (ante, p. 896), or whose husband shall have been convicted on indictment of an assault on her and sentenced to pay a fine of more than five pounds, or to a term of imprisonment exceeding two months . . . (s), may apply to any Court of summary jurisdiction acting within the city, borough, petty sessional or other division or district in which any such conviction has taken place . . . for an order or orders under this Act: (i.e. for release from obligation to cohabit with her husband, custody of the children of the marriage, and maintenance, sect. 5). Provided that where a married woman is entitled to apply for an order or orders under this section on the ground of the conviction of her husband upon indictment, she may apply to the Court before whom her husband has been convicted, and that Court shall, for the purpose of this section, become a Court of summary jurisdiction and shall have the power without a jury to hear an application and make the order or orders applied for' (s).

An order cannot be made under the Act if the wife is proved to have been guilty of adultery, unless the husband has condoned, or connived at, or by his wilful neglect or misconduct induced to, the adultery (sect. 6).

(r) R. v. Gaunt, 18 Cox, 210.

(s) This Act takes the place of 41 & 42 Vict. c. 19. In R. v. Knowles, 65 J. P. 27, an order was made under the proviso in the case of a husband convicted and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment for throwing corrosive fluid on his wife with intent to burn (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 29, ante, p. 867).

To discharge a pistol loaded with powder and wadding at a person within such a short distance that the party might have been hit, is an assault. R. v. Cronan (1874), 24 U.C.C.P. 106. And see, as to pointing fire-arms. Code sec. 122.

A blow struck in anger or which is intended or is likely to do corporal hurt is a criminal assault, notwithstanding the consent to fight of the person struck. R. v. Buchanan (1898), 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 442 (Man.).

A conviction for unlawfully assaulting V. by standing in front of the horses and carriage driven by the said V. in a hostile manner, and thereby forcibly detaining him, the said V. in the public highway against his will, was held bad, in stating the detention as a conclusion and not as part of the charge. It will not be inferred as a matter of law that standing in front of the horses was a forcible detention, there being no statement that the detention was by any other means than mere passive resistance. *R. v. School Teacher and Pupil.—A school teacher who inflicts unreasonably severe chastisement upon a pupil is criminally responsible, under Code secs. 63 and 66, for the excess of force, used, although the punishment occasional no permanent injury and was inflicted without malice. R. v. Gaul (1904), 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 178.

The following principles are laid down by Judge Chipman in the Nova Scotia case of R. v. Robinson (1899), 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 52:—

(1) The authority of a school teacher to chastise a pupil is to be regarded as a delegation of parental authority.

(2) Corporal punishment inflicted by a school teacher upon a pupil is presumed to be reasonable and for sufficient cause, until the contrary is shewn.

(3) Where there is a sufficient cause for punishing the pupil, and the chastisement produces only temporary pain and no serious injury, it will be presumed to be reasonable.

(4) Any punishment with an instrument calculated to produce danger to life or limb is unreasonable and unlawful.

(5) Any punishment protracted beyond the child's powers of endurance is excessive and unlawful.

(6) Any punishment which ordinarily may seriously endanger life, limbs, or health, or which disfigures the child, or causes any other permanent injury, is in itself unreasonable and unlawful.

(7) If there is any reasonable doubt whether the punishment was excessive, the school teacher should have the benefit of the doubt.

Defendant being justified by this section if the force used by him to repel an unprovoked assault was not meant to cause death or grievous bodily harm, or was no more than was necessary for the purpose of self-defence, and there being evidence which, if believed, would have enabled the jury to find for defendant, the trial Judge erred in charging the jury that there must be evidence that defendant could not otherwise preserve himself from death or grievous bodily harm. R. v. Ritter (1904), 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 31, 36 N.S.R. 417.

The trial Judge having instructed the jury that, to justify or excuse the homicide, the prisoner must be found to have had reasonable grounds for apprehending imminent peril to his life or the lives of his wife and children, and having made no mention of a reasonable apprehension of grievous bodily harm as a ground of justification although the evidence pointed to both, a new trial was ordered. R. v. Theriault (1894), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 444.

An assault is not justified by the circumstance that the person assaulted had then and there sworn at the defendant and used insulting language towards him but without any attempt to assault the defendant, whereupon the defendant assaulted the complainant. *Wentzell v. The mere threat of parties standing outside of a dwelling house that they will break in does not justify the householder in shooting at and wounding them, unless the householder has first warned them to desist and depart or that he would fire. Spires v. Barrick, 14 U.C.Q.B. 420.

(f) Defence of Real Property.—Code sec. 61.

The words are “if such trespasser resists such attempt.” The word “such” applies to an attempt by force referred to in the former part of the section, and will not apply to mere words of warning or of request to leave. Packett v. Pool (1896), 11 Man. R. 275, 32 C.L.J. 523. The latter part of the section does not apply until there is an overt act on the part of the person in possession towards prevention or removal, and an overt act of resistance on the part of the trespasser. Ibid.

Trespass for assaulting the plaintiff, and shooting at and wounding him with a pistol. Plea, that the plaintiff and thirty others threatened to break into defendant’s dwelling house where he was peacefully residing with his family, and to assault, tar and feather, and ride him on a rail; that they were armed and riotously assembled in front of the house, and apparently in the act of breaking into it to accomplish such threats; whereupon defendant, having good reason to believe and verily believing that they were then breaking into his house against his will, for the said purpose, in defence of himself and his house, and in order to prevent them from entering and tarring and feathering, etc., opposed such entrance, and in so doing unavoidably committed the trespasses in the declaration mentioned, as he lawfully might, using no unnecessary force or violence, and doing no more injury to the plaintiff than was necessary to effect such purpose.

Held, on demurrer, plea bad, as shewing no defence, for before firing defendant should have warned the plaintiff to desist and depart, which was not averred. Spires v. Barrick, 14 U.C.Q.B. 420.

A conviction for common assault would be a bar to a subsequent prosecution for assault occasioning bodily harm. Larin v. Boyd, 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 74.

The term “actual bodily harm” does not imply a wounding or breaking of the skin. R. v. Hostetter (1902), 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 221, 5 Terr. L.R. 363.

In a prosecution for an assault occasioning actual bodily harm, it is improper to exclude evidence of statements sworn to by a witness for the prosecution at a preliminary enquiry, the record of the depositions upon which had been lost, as to what was said by the accused at the time of the assault, as such statements of the witness had reference to statements of the accused forming a part of the res gestæ. R. v. Troop (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 22.

The fact that a prisoner committed for trial for assault occasioning bodily harm was told by the constable removing him to gaol under the commitment that the assaulted party would die, is not evidence of an inducement or threat to the prisoner so as to make his subsequent question, “What do you think I will get—about 15 years?” inadmissible against him. The prisoner’s question under the circumstances raised a strong inference that he was present when the injuries were inflicted. R. v. Bruce (1907), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 275.

Assault on Wife or Other Female Doing Bodily Harm.—8 & 9 Edw. VII. ch. 9, sec. 242.

Where a constable was assaulted while attempting to execute a warrant issued by two justices for non-payment of a fine and costs imposed on a person convicted of an offence, and the justice had jurisdiction over the offence, and the warrant was valid on its face, it was held that a conviction for the assault would lie notwithstanding the fact that part of the original conviction by the two justices was erroneous in awarding a punishment which was not authorized. R. v. King (1889), 18 Ont. R. 566. The offence of obstructing a peace officer in the execution of his duty is dealt with by Code secs. 168 and 169.

A fine as well as imprisonment may be imposed on the conviction of the accused, if tried either by a Court of criminal jurisdiction or by a "magistrate" under the Summary Trials Procedure. Sec. 1058, Ex parte McClements (1895), 32 C.L.J. 39.

A magistrate summarily trying, with the consent of the accused, a charge of aggravated assault has jurisdiction to award costs against the accused as well as to impose both fine and imprisonment. R. v. Burtress (1900), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 536 (N.S.).

An assault on a constable attempting to serve a summons issued by a magistrate on information charging violation of the Canada Temperance Act is an assault on a peace officer in the due execution of his duty. R. v. MacFarlane, 16 S.C.R. 393.

Opening a railway switch with intent to cause a collision whereby two trains did come into collision, causing a severe injury to a person on one of them, is not an assault. In re Lewis, 6 O.P.R. 236.

Where the accused found committing an offence is arrested without warrant by a peace officer, and on being brought before a police magistrate a written charge not under oath is read over to him, and he thereupon consents to be tried summarily, the police magistrate has jurisdiction to try the case although no information has been laid under oath. R. v. McLean (1901), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 67 (N.S.).

Proceedings on Arraignment.—Code sec. 783.

Code sec. 169 deals with resistance or obstruction to, and Code sec. 296(b) with assault on, an officer in the execution of his duty. Code secs. 773 and 783, treats of the trial of both offences.

The provisions of Cr. Code sec. 169 fixing the punishment for which anyone guilty of obstructing a peace officer shall be liable "on summary conviction," are controlled by Code secs. 773 and 778, and the charge cannot be summarily charged by a magistrate except the consent of the accused is given in conformity with sec. 778. R. v. Crossen, 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 153.

By sec. 709 it is provided that no justice shall hear and determine any case of assault or battery in which any question arises as to the title to any tenements, hereditaments or any interest therein or accruing therefrom, or as to any bankruptcy or insolvency, or any execution under the process of any Court of justice. Rent payable under a lease of land is an incorporeal hereditament. Kennedy v. MacDonnell (1901), 1 O.L.R. 250.

A summary conviction for assault upon a female, causing bruises, will be presumed one of common assault under Code secs. 291 and 732, and not of an assault occasioning bodily harm under sec. 295 where there has been no election of summary trial. Larin v. Boyd, 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 74.

A summary conviction imposing a sentence of sixty days is not invalid where the statutory maximum is two months, unless there is a reasonable probability of the sixty days' term being in the particular case more than two months. R. v. Brindley (1906), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 170, per Graham, E.J.; but see contra the decision of Russell, J., in the same case. And see note 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 173.

A magistrate holding a preliminary enquiry for an indictable offence may not proceed to summarily convict on the evidence given therein for both the accused and the prosecutor for a lesser offence included in the offence charged, although such lesser offence, if originally charged, would have been within his jurisdiction for trial. Ex p. Duffy (1901), 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 277.

Upon a summary trial for inflicting grievous bodily harm, the magistrate may convict instead for the lesser offence of common assault in like manner as a jury might do. The punishment which may be imposed by a city stipendiary magistrate convicting of common assault upon a summary trial for a greater offence under sec. 777 is that which is provided in case of conviction upon indictment, i.e., one year's imprisonment or a fine of $100. R. v. Coolen (1903), 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 522.

Where the sentence imposed upon a summary trial by consent before a city stipendiary magistrate for common assault was, in the first instance, three months' imprisonment without mention of hard labour, and the minute of adjudication did not include hard labour, a formal conviction, including hard labour, and a commitment thereon in similar terms are invalid and the accused will be discharged on habeas corpus. Ex parte Carmichael, 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 19.

A city stipendiary magistrate holding a summary trial under Code sec. 777, may impose imprisonment not exceeding one year for common assault although Code sec. 291 specifies such punishment with the addition of the words "if convicted upon an indictment." Sec. 777 gives to police and stipendiary magistrates of towns and cities the power to award on summary trials held with the consent of the accused, the same punishment as an Ontario Court of General Sessions might impose on a trial on indictment. R. v. Hawes (1902), 6 Can. Cr. Cas. 238, per Graham, E.J. In the same case Townshend, J., held, that upon a summary trial for common assault, the imprisonment authorized by Code sec. 291 can only be imposed in the first instance, and that where a fine is imposed the imprisonment in default of payment thereof is controlled by Code sec. 739(b) and is therefore limited to three months.

CHAPTER THE SEVENTH.

OF FALSE IMPRISONMENT, KIDNAPPING, AND CHILD-STEALING.

SECT. I.—FALSE IMPRISONMENT.

FALSE imprisonment is unlawful and total restraint of the personal liberty of another, whether by constraining him or compelling him to go to a particular place (a) or by confining him in a prison or police-station or private place, or by detaining him against his will in a public place (b). It usually, but not necessarily involves an assault (c) or battery (d) or some degree of threatened or actual violence to the person (e); but the essential element in the offence is the unlawful detention of the person or the unlawful restraint on his liberty. Such interference with the liberty of another's movements is unlawful unless it can be justified at common law or by statute as having been made under the lawful process or order of a Court of Justice or a competent official, or in exercise of a lawful authority to arrest without such warrant or order in respect of an offence committed, or to restrain the person imprisoned from committing some crime or act dangerous to others. Thus it is false imprisonment to detain a

(a) Pocock v. Moore, Ry. & M. 321, where the defendant had given a man in charge of a police officer to be taken to a police station.

(b) 2 Co. Inst. 589. Com. Dig. tit. 'Imprisonment' (G.). 3 Bl. Com. 127. In the Queensland Criminal Code, 1899, the common-law offence is thus described: 'any person who unlawfully confines or detains another in any place against his will, or otherwise unlawfully deprives another of his personal liberty is guilty of a misdemeanor.' In Bird v. Jones, 7 Q.B. 742, the majority of the Court held that where the plaintiff in attempting to go in a particular direction was prevented from going in any direction but one, not being that in which he endeavoured to pass, it was not an imprisonment, and this, whether the plaintiff had or had not a right to pass in the first-mentioned direction. 'A prison may have its boundary large or narrow, visible and tangible, or, though real, still in the conception only; it may itself be movable or fixed; but a boundary it must have; and that boundary the party imprisoned must be prevented from passing: he must be prevented from leaving that place, within the ambit of which the party imprisoning him would confine him, except by prison breach.' Coleridge, J., said: 'In general, if one man compels another to stay in any given place against his will, he imprisons that other just as much as if he locked him up in a room; and it is not necessary in order to constitute an imprisonment that a man's person should be touched. The compelling a man to go in a given direction against his will may amount to imprisonment.' Patteson, J., said: 'Imprisonment is a total restraint of the person for however short a time, and not a partial obstruction of his will, whatever inconvenience it bring on him.' See also Warner v. Riddiford, 4 C. B. (N. S.) 180. Where the schoolmaster of a Board School kept in a child for not preparing his home lessons, it was held that he was liable to be convicted of an assault, since the Education Acts do not authorise the setting of Home lessons. Hunter v. Johnson, 13 Q.B.D. 225.

prisoner after his acquittal (f) or after his term of imprisonment has expired (g); and detention upon warrant or process which is regular in form is unlawful if the warrant is executed at an unlawful time, e.g. in case of civil process, on a Sunday (h), or on civil process in a privileged place, such as a Royal palace (i) or a Court of justice (j) or of a person privileged from arrest (k).

False imprisonment is indictable (l) at common law as well as actionable, and is punishable by fine and (or) imprisonment without hard labour (m). But it is unusual to proceed by indictment for false imprisonment alone, though the fact of illegal detention may be stated as matter of aggravation in an indictment for assault and battery.

In R. v. Lesley (n), the master of a British merchant ship was indicted for false imprisonment of certain Chilians whom he had received on board his ship in Chilian waters under contract with the Chilian government to convey them to Liverpool. On a case reserved it was held that he had been properly convicted on the indictment, inasmuch as the detention of the Chilians in the ship after it left Chilian waters was wrongful by the law of the flag, and being intentionally planned and executed in the pursuance of the contract, was in law indictable as false imprisonment.

In R. v. Linsberg (o), on an indictment for false imprisonment it was ruled that mere false imprisonment without belief in the existence of any authority, was indictable, although no actual assault or battery took place.

AMERICAN AND COLONIAL NOTES.

¹ It is said in America that a man would be justified in resisting to the death an attempt to forcibly carry him out of his country. See Bishop, Amer. Cr. L. i. s. 868(3).

Kidnapping need only be the sending of the person to any other place. See S. v. Rollins, 8 N. H. 550, and it is suggested that a mere intent to carry away is sufficient.

the will of his friends or lawful guardians, sometimes called kidnapping, is an offence at common law, punishable by fine and imprisonment without hard labour (p). The most aggravated form of kidnapping is the forcible abduction or stealing and carrying away of any person from his own country into some other (q), or to parts beyond the seas, whereby he is deprived of the friendly assistance of the laws to redeem him from captivity (r). The carrying away of females is usually termed abduction, and the statutes punishing various forms of such abduction are dealt with post, p. 959. By the Habeas Corpus Act, 1679 (31 Car. II. c. 2) s. 11, 'for preventing illegal imprisonment in prisons beyond the seas,' it is enacted 'that no subject of this realm, that now is or hereafter shall be an inhabitant or resiant of this Kingdom of England, dominion of Wales or Town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, shall or may be sent prisoner into Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, Tangier or into any parts, garrisons, islands, or places beyond the seas, which are or at any time hereafter shall be within or without the dominions of His Majesty, his heirs and successors.' Such imprisonment is then declared to be illegal; and an action for false imprisonment is given to the party, with treble costs, and damages not less than five hundred pounds (s). The section then proceeds thus:— 'And the person or persons who shall knowingly frame, contrive, write, seal or countersign, any warrant for such commitment, detainer, or transportation, or shall so detain, imprison, or transport, any person or persons, contrary to this Act, or be any ways advising, aiding, or assisting therein,' being lawfully convicted thereof, shall be disabled from thenceforth to bear any office of trust or profit within England, &c., or the dominions thereunto belonging, and shall incur the pains, &c., of the Statute of Præmunire (16 Rich. II. c. 5), and shall be incapable of any pardon from the King of such forfeitures or disabilities (t). Sect. 15 provides that offenders may be sent to be tried where their offences were committed, and where they ought to be tried. Sect. 16 enacts, that prosecutions for offences against the Act must be within two years after the offence committed, if the party grieved be not then in prison; and if he be in prison, then within two years after his decease, or delivery out of prison, which shall first happen.

Though in terms applied to subjects the Act appears to extend to persons owing temporary allegiance, and the removal of alien friends

SECT. III.—OF CHILD-STEALING.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 56, 'Whosoever shall unlawfully, either by force or fraud, lead or take away, or decoy or entice away or detain, any child under the age of fourteen years, with intent to deprive any parent, guardian, or other person having the lawful care or charge of such child, of the possession of such child, or with intent to steal any article upon or about the person of such child, to whomsoever such article may belong, and whosoever shall, with any such intent, receive or harbour any such child, knowing the same to have been, by force or fraud, led, taken, decoyed, enticed away, or detained as in this section before mentioned, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years . . . or to be imprisoned . . . (v), and, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping: Provided that no person who shall have claimed any right to the possession of such child, or shall be the mother or shall have claimed to be the father of an illegitimate child, shall be liable to be prosecuted by virtue hereof on account of the getting possession of such child, or taking such child out of the possession of any person having the lawful charge thereof' (w).

The provisions as to evidence, &c., of the Children Act, 1908 (x), apply to this offence.

In R. v. Duguid (y), it was held that a conspiracy with the mother of a child under fourteen to carry the child away from its lawful guardian was indictable even if the mother could not herself be convicted of an offence against sect. 56 or of a conspiracy to commit it (z).

A person may be convicted under this section even though the child is no longer in his custody and there is no evidence to shew where it is (a). The force or fraud may be committed on the parent or guardian of the child, or on the child itself, or upon any other person (b).

SECT. IV.—ILLEGALLY LEAVING MERCHANT SEAMEN BEHIND (c).

By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. c. 48) s. 43 (d), 'A person belonging to a British ship shall not wrongfully force a seaman (e) on shore and leave him behind, or otherwise cause a seaman to be wrongfully left behind at any place either on shore or at sea, in or out of His Majesty's dominions, and if he does so he shall in respect of each offence be guilty of a misdemeanor (h).

By sect. 36 (1), 'The master of a British ship shall not leave a seaman (d) behind at any place out of the United Kingdom, ashore or at sea, except where the seaman is discharged in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Acts, unless he previously obtains endorsed on the agreement with the crew, the certificate of the proper authority (f) as defined for that purpose in this Act stating the cause of the seaman being left behind, whether the cause be unfitness or inability to proceed to sea, desertion, or disappearance or otherwise (g).

(3) If the master of a ship fails to comply with this section he shall (without prejudice to his liability under any other provision of the Merchant Shipping Acts, be guilty in respect of each offence of a misdemeanor (h), and in any legal proceeding for the offence it shall be on the master to prove that the certificate was obtained or could not be obtained without unreasonable delay to the ship or was unreasonably withheld.'

As to the jurisdiction and venue on trials for these offences, see 57 58 Vict. c. 60 ss. 684, 685, 686, 687 (ante, p. 43).

On an indictment on 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 19 (rep.), against a master of a vessel for leaving one of his crew at Quebec, in Lower Canada, for the defence a certificate was put in evidence which stated that the defendant appeared before E. B. a commissioner for carrying the Act into effect, and being duly sworn, said that the seaman in question did desert from the vessel while at Quebec, and was then absent without leave. It was held that this certificate was insufficient, inasmuch it did not certify the facts as ascertained by the proper officer, that the captain deposed to certain things before him (i).

The defendant was master of a merchant ship, belonging to a subject of the United Kingdom (j), namely, J. H. and E. W. and H. G. were

(d) This section re-enacts with variations 57 & 58 Vict. c. 60, s. 187, which took the place of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120, s. 205, which section superseded and replaced the earlier enactments, 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 19, ss. 40, 42 and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 1.

(f) The proper authority in a foreign country is a British Consular official, or, if there be none, two, or if there are not two, one British merchant; in a British possession, the Chief Officer of Customs at or near the place. 6 Edw. VII. c. 48, s. 49 (1). The authority is to examine into the grounds of application, and may take evidence on oath, and may grant or refuse the certificate, but may not unreasonably refuse it. 6 Edw. VII. c. 48, s. 36 (2).

(h) Punishable under 57 & 58 Vict. c. 60, s. 680, by fine or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not over two years on a conviction on indictment. It may be prosecuted summarily, in which event the maximum fine is £100, and the maximum term of imprisonment is six months with or without hard labour.

persons belonging to the crew, duly engaged to serve in a voyage, which was not then completed ; the indictment alleged that the defendant at B. unlawfully, wilfully, and wrongfully did leave the said E. W. and H. G. behind on shore, before the completion of their voyage, on the plea that they were not in a condition to proceed on the voyage, he not having obtained a previous certificate in writing of the said consul or of any such functionary of their not being in such condition, there being time to obtain such certificate (k). It appeared that E. W. and H. G. were both ill when the vessel put into B. on her voyage, and went ashore, and saw the doctor, who said they were not sick enough to be left on shore, and go to the hospital, as they wished ; they then went to the English consul, who said he could do nothing without the doctor's certificate, that they came again and asked for their clothes, and the mate, believing that they had got their discharge, though they did not say so, let them have them ; that they were very ill, and if they had not gone on shore at B. and got medical advice, one of them would have died. The collector of customs of the port of Harwich produced a certificate of the registry of the ship with the name J. H. in it, which he knew to be his signature, but did not see him write it : the declaration was signed by him. He knew H. personally. He did not know where he was born : he was a British subject ; he knew he was so by the declaration which he had made. He believed him to be an Englishman. Cresswell and Coleridge, JJ., were of opinion, first, that the allegation of ownership was a material allegation, and must be proved as laid ; secondly, that the 41st (l) and 42nd sections of 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 19, did not create separate offences, but that they should be taken together, and were intended to shew that certain conduct on the part of the seaman will not excuse the captain, unless he produce the required certificate ; and therefore, thirdly, that on this indictment, which charged the defendant with wrongfully and wilfully leaving behind him two persons belonging to his crew, the only answer he could give would be either to prove the certificate, or shew the impossibility of obtaining it ; and not having done either of these things, if the jury believed the evidence, he must be found guilty (m).

(k) The count concluded with an averment that the defendant was found within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, which appears to be now unnecessary. See post, p. 981.

CANADIAN NOTES.

OF FALSE IMPRISONMENT, KIDNAPPING, AND CHILD-STEALING.

Sec. 1.—False Imprisonment.

This is not the subject of any provision of the Code. It is, however, still an offence at common law.

To compel a man to go in a given direction against his will may amount to an imprisonment; but if a man merely obstructs the passage of another in a particular direction whether by threats of personal violence or otherwise, leaving him at liberty to stay where he is or go in any other direction if he pleases, he cannot be said to thereby imprison him. Bird v. Jones (1845), 7 Q.B. 742, per Patteson, J.

Detention of a prisoner after expiry of his sentence is false imprisonment. Moone v. Rose (1869), L.R. 4 Q.B. 486.

Sec. 2.—Kidnapping.—Code sec. 297 (as amended by 8 & 9 Edw. VII. ch. 9).

Sec. 3.—Child Stealing.—Code sec. 316.

The child's own father may be guilty of child-stealing within the Code, if after a divorce by a Court of competent jurisdiction and the award thereon of the custody of the child to the mother, the father wilfully removes the child from her custody. R. v. Watts, 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 538.

Where a divorce decree of a Court of competent jurisdiction in the United States has awarded the custody of a child to the father as against the mother, and the mother thereafter removes and conceals the child for the purpose of evading the decree, a primâ facie case for extradition is thereby made out against the mother upon a charge of child-stealing. And, semble, the offence of child-stealing under the Code, may be complete against the child's mother although the father, to whom the child's custody has been awarded, has never had any actual separate possession of the child. Re Lorenz (1905), 9 Can. CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.

OF NEGLECT AND ILL-TREATMENT OF THE YOUNG, THE HELPLESS AND THE INSANE.

SECT. I.—COMMON LAW.

It is an indictable misdemeanor at common law to refuse or neglect to provide sufficient food or other necessities for any person such as a child, apprentice, or servant, unable to provide for and take care of himself, whom the party is obliged by duty or contract to provide for ; so as thereby seriously to injure health (a). The obligation is, it would seem, limited to cases where the person neglected is of tender years or helpless or so dominated by the parent or employer as to be unable to do for itself (b). It has been extended to cases where an aged or sick person, neither servant nor apprentice, but under the care or control of another, is neglected so as to cause death or injury to health (c). Where an indictment stated that W., ' an infant of tender years,' was placed ' under the care and control of ' the prisoners as a servant, and that it was their duty to supply her with sufficient food, &c., and also to permit her to have sufficient food, &c., and that they neglected to supply her with sufficient food, &c. ; and refused to let her have sufficient food, &c. ; whereby her health was injured. W. was between fourteen and seventeen years of age during the time of the ill-treatment alleged, and it did not appear that she was prevented from going out and complaining of the treatment she received. It was held, first, that W. was not an infant of tender years. A person of tender years is a person incapable of acting or judging for himself. And children of much earlier age may contract marriage and other relations, and are competent in law to act for themselves. Secondly, that the terms ' under the care and control ' of the prisoners meant under such control as to be prevented from acting for herself, and that this girl was a free agent ; and, therefore, the indictment was not proved (d).

(a) R. v. Friend, R. & R. 20, and MS. Bayley, J. Chambre, J., differed, thinking it not an indictable offence, but a matter founded wholly on contract, in this which was the case of an apprentice. See R. v. Senior [1899], 1 Q.B. 283, 289. As to the neglect of paupers by overseers of the poor, see ante, p. 606.

(b) The obligation has been held to apply to a servant (R. v. Ridley, 2 Camp. 650), except where the servant was of full age and able to take care of herself and to leave the service. R. v. Smith, L. & C. 607, 620, 625.

(c) R. v. Instan [1893], 1 Q.B. 450, ante, p. 678. As to lunatics, vide post, p. 924. In Urmston v. Newcomen, 4 A. & E. 899, in answer to a remark by counsel, that, ' by the common law if a child perish for want of proper care, it is murder in the party neglecting it,' Denman, C.J., said : ' If the person has the actual custody,' and Patterson, J., added : ' Or the child be part of his family, would it be murder in the parent to abscond ? ' As regards ill-treatment, this opinion seems to be over-ridden by R. v. Connor [1908], 2 K.B. 26, post, p. 914.

(d) Anon. 5 Cox, 279, Coleridge and Cresswell, JJ. The latter said, ' If being of ordinary or even superior intellect and capacity, she was so under the control of the defendants, so impressed with fear either from being watched or being threatened, as to be unable to resort to the assistance of her natural defenders or of other persons, then a duty would devolve on the defendants greater than that arising from the civil contract.'

In these cases it must be both alleged and proved that the health was seriously injured. In R. v. Phillpot (e), the indictment alleged that the prisoner was the mother, and had the care of an infant female child unable to support itself, and that it was the duty of the prisoner to support the child, but that the prisoner unlawfully neglected to support it, and unlawfully abandoned it without necessary food for a long space of time, whereby the child was greatly injured and weakened. The prisoner was the wife of a seaman, and received a portion of his pay, and was able to work and get her living if she chose; she left the child without food from Monday evening till Thursday morning, and but for the attention of a poor neighbour, the child must have suffered most severely, and might probably have died for want of food, and though it did suffer in some degree from want of food, it was not to any serious extent; and it was held that the conduct of the prisoner in absenting herself, irrespective of any actual injury to the child, was not a misdemeanor at common law, and therefore it was necessary to prove the averment that the child was greatly injured and weakened; and that the evidence that the child had suffered to some but not to any serious extent was not sufficient, as it did not shew any injury to health (f).

It is the duty of all persons having children of tender age, whom they cannot support, to endeavour to obtain the means of getting them support, and if they wilfully abstain for several days from resorting to the poor-law authorities of the place where they have by law a right to support, they are criminally responsible for the consequences (g).

In R. v. Chandler (h), the indictment alleged that the prisoner was a single woman and the mother of a child of very tender age and unable to provide for itself, and that it was the duty of the prisoner to provide food for the child, she 'being able and having the means to perform her said duty,' and that she unlawfully neglected to provide sufficient food for the child, whereby its life was endangered. There was no evidence that the prisoner actually had the means of supporting the child; but it was proved that she could have applied to the relieving officer of the union, and, had she done so, she would have been entitled to and would have received relief for herself and the child adequate to their due support and maintenance, and that she had not made any such application. It was held that the allegation in the indictment that the prisoner had the means of maintaining the child was not proved.

In R. v. Rugg (i), the first count of the indictment charged the prisoner with neglecting to provide sufficient food for her infant child, 'she being able and having the means to perform her duty' in that respect. The jury found her guilty on the ground that 'if she had applied to the guardians for relief she would have had it,' and the Court held, on the authority of R. v. Chandler (supra) that the finding of the jury was not sufficient to maintain the count. A second count charged the neglect to provide food, but omitted the allegation that she had means to do so, and it was doubted if the count was good in law (j); Bovill, C. J., said :

(j) See R. v. Ryland, infra. R. v. Shepherd, L. & C. 147, ante, p. 675.

‘ We have to consider the effect of the verdict of the petit jury on the first two counts. They found a verdict of guilty, but added, “ we do so on the ground that if she had applied ” (to the guardians) “ for relief, she would have had it.” The case of R. v. Chandler shews that that finding was not sufficient to maintain the first count of the indictment, which contains the allegation of ability and means on the part of the prisoner. On the second count of the indictment, assuming that count to be good, which we doubt, the allegation is, that the prisoner unlawfully and wilfully did neglect and refuse to find and provide her child with necessary food, &c. ; but there is no allegation that the prisoner had the means of procuring, or could have procured it, and wilfully abstained from doing so. The allegation in that count is not found by the jury. On these grounds we are of opinion that the conviction should be quashed.’ This ruling conflicts with R. v. Mabbet (supra) and appears to be no longer law : see the provisions in sect. 12 of the Children Act, 1908 (post, p. 913).

An indictment for neglecting to provide sufficient food and sustenance for a child of tender years, whereby the child became ill and enfeebled, averred that it was the duty of the prisoner to provide for, give, and administer to the said child wholesome and sufficient meat, drink, and clothing for the sustenance, &c., of the said child, and that he unlawfully, and contrary to his said duty in that behalf, did omit, neglect, and refuse to provide for, &c., the child :—It was held that the indictment sufficiently alleged the breach of duty, and that the prisoner had the ability to provide but omitted to exercise it (k).

A parent who wilfully withholds necessary food from his child, with the wilful determination by such withholding to cause the death of the child, is guilty of murder, if the child dies, and if he does so negligently but not wilfully, and the child dies in consequence of the neglect, he is guilty of manslaughter (l).

Medical Aid.—At common law a parent appears to be bound to provide medical attendance for his child (m), and a master bound to provide medical attendance for his apprentice (n). But the obligation is said not to extend to servants (o). When the child is under sixteen want of means is no excuse if the poor-law doctor is available.

As to liability for death caused by failure to provide medical advice, see ante, p. 674.

SECT. II.—OF ILL-TREATMENT OF APPRENTICES AND SERVANTS.

either as a master or mistress, to provide for any apprentice or servant necessary food, clothing, or lodging, shall wilfully and without lawful excuse refuse or neglect to provide the same, or shall unlawfully and maliciously do or cause to be done any bodily harm to any such apprentice or servant, so that the life of such apprentice or servant shall be endangered, or the health of such apprentice or servant shall have been or shall be likely to be permanently injured, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude . . . (r). This enactment contains no words making it necessary to prove that the apprentice was of tender years or under the dominion or control of the master or mistress. The words 'so that . . . injure' appear to apply both to refusal or neglect to supply food and to causing bodily harm. The enactment is silent as to medical attendance. By sect. 73 guardians of the poor may be required (s) to prosecute offenders under this sect. Where the apprentice or servant is under sixteen the provisions as to evidence, &c., of the Children Act, 1908 (post, p. 918) are applicable.

By the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), s. 6, a master is punishable on summary conviction by imprisonment not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour for wilfully and without lawful excuse neglecting to supply necessary food, &c., or medical aid, whereby the health of the servant or apprentice is likely to be seriously or permanently injured (ss).

SECT. III.—DANGEROUS PERFORMANCES BY YOUNG PERSONS.

By the Children's Dangerous Performances Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 34), s. 3 . . . 'Where in the course of a public exhibition or performance, which in its nature is dangerous to the life or limb of a child under such age as aforesaid' (under fourteen years) 'taking part therein, any accident causing actual bodily harm occurs to any such child, the employer of such child shall be liable to be indicted as having committed an assault, and the Court before whom such employer is convicted on indictment shall have the power of awarding compensation not exceeding £20, to be paid by such employer to the child, or to some person named by the Court on behalf of the child, for the bodily injury so occasioned, provided that no person shall be punished twice for the same offence (t).

By sect. 4 of the Act, if the child is apparently of the age alleged, it lies on the accused to prove that the child is not of that age (u).

By the Dangerous Performances Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 52) s. 1, (r) For other punishments see 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212. The words omitted were repealed in 1892.

(s) This does not exclude prosecutions by other persons. Caswell v. Morgan, 28 L. J. M. C. 209. Cf. 8 Edw. VII. c. 67, s. 34, post, p. 921.

(ss) The accused may elect to be tried on indictment, vide ante, p. 17.

(t) It is difficult to see how this offence should be described in an indictment, and it is not clear whether the compensation is cumulative on or alternative to the punishment. The earlier part of the section imposes a penalty on summary conviction for causing a child under fourteen to take part in a public performance, whereby in the opinion of the Court the life or limbs of the child shall be endangered.

(u) Cf. 8 Edw. VII. c. 67, s. 123, post, p. 922. As to training children under sixteen for exhibitions of a dangerous nature, see 3 Edw. VII. c. 45, s. 3 (5).

'The Children's Dangerous Performances Act, 1879 (supra) shall apply in the case of any male young person under the age of sixteen years and any female young person under the age of eighteen years in like manner as it applies in the case of a child under the age of fourteen years' (v).

By sect. 2 (1) 'Except where an accident causing actual bodily harm occurs to any child or young person no prosecution or other proceeding shall be instituted for an offence against the Children's Dangerous Performances Act, 1879, as amended by this Act without the consent in writing (w) of the chief officer of police (x) of the area in which the offence is committed. In the case of persons under 16 the provisions as to evidence of the Children Act, 1908 (post, p. 918) are applicable.

SECT. IV.—EXPOSING OR ABANDONING CHILDREN UNDER TWO.

By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 27 (y), 'Whosoever shall unlawfully abandon or expose (z) any child, being under the age of two years, whereby the life of such child shall be endangered, or the health of such child shall have been or shall be likely to be permanently injured, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude . . . (a),

The provisions of 8 Edw. VII. c. 67, post, p. 918, as to presumption of age, evidence, &c., apply to proceedings under this section.

The prisoners were convicted on an indictment under sect. 27, which charged that they did abandon and expose a child, under the age of two years, whereby the life of the child was endangered. One of the prisoners was the mother of the child, which was illegitimate, and both prisoners put the child in a hamper at S., wrapped up in a shawl, and packed with shavings and cotton wool, and the mother took the hamper to the booking office of the railway station at M., and left it, having paid the carriage of it to G. The hamper was addressed to the lodgings of the father of the child at G. She told the clerk at the office to be very careful of it, and to send it by the next train, which was due in ten minutes from that time. Upon the address were the words written 'With care; to be delivered immediately.' The hamper was carried by the passenger train, and was delivered at its address in a little less than an hour from leaving M. On its being opened the child was found alive. The child was taken by the relieving officer the same evening to the union workhouse, where it lived for three weeks afterwards, when it died from causes not attributable to the conduct of the prisoners, or either of them. It was proved to have

(w) It is submitted that this means consent previous to the institution of the proceeding. See Thorpe v. Priestnall [1897], 1 Q.B. 159, decided on a similar provision in the Sunday Observance Prosecution Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 87).

(x) In the City of London the Commissioner of City Police, and elsewhere in England defined in the Police Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 45).

(y) This section was new law in 1861, and is intended to provide for cases where children are abandoned or exposed under such circumstances that their lives or health may be, or be likely to be, endangered. See R. v. Hogan, 2 Den. 277; R. v. Cooper, 1 Den. 459, 2 C. & K. 876; R. v. Phillpot, 1 Dears. 179; R. v. Gray, D. & B. 303, which shew the necessity for this enactment. In R. v. Hogan, an indictment at common law for abandoning was held bad because it did not aver injury to the child nor means in the parent.

(z) As to exposure amounting to assault, vide post, p. 912.

(a) For other punishments see 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212. The words omitted are repealed.

been a delicate child :—On a case reserved a conviction on these facts was upheld (b).

The prisoner was the father of a child under two years of age. The child was in the custody of the mother, who was living apart from the prisoner. The mother brought the child to him and left it outside the door of his house at about seven o'clock p.m. He was inside, and she called out 'Bill, here's your child, I can't keep it; I am gone.' She left, and the prisoner afterwards came out of the house, stepped over the child, and went away. An hour and a half afterwards the child was still lying in the road outside the wicket of the garden; it was dressed in short clothes, and had nothing on its head. The prisoner's attention was called to the child when he came home, after a further interval of an hour and a half. He said that he should not touch it, and that those that brought it there must come and take it. The child was found at one a.m. lying cold and stiff :—On a case reserved it was held, that the prisoner was rightly convicted of having abandoned and exposed the child, within the meaning of sect. 27 (c).

In R. v. Renshaw (d), a mother left her child, ten days old, at the bottom of a dry ditch, by which there was a path, and a lane separated from the ditch by a hedge; Parke, B., is reported to have said that 'there were no marks of violence on the child, and it does not appear in the result that the child actually experienced any inconvenience, as it was providentially found soon after it was exposed, and therefore, although it is said in some of the books that an exposure to the inclemency of the weather may amount to an assault, yet, if that be so at all, it can only be when the person suffers a hurt or injury of some kind or other from the exposure (e). The acts made the subject of indictment in that case now fall within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 27, and Part II. of the Children Act, 1908, post, p. 913, and the provisions of that Act as to evidence, &c. (post, p. 918) apply.

SECT. V.—CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

The common-law liability for neglect of children has been stated, ante, p. 907.

The history of legislation on the subject is as follows. By sect. 37 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 122), it was made an offence for a parent wilfully to neglect to provide adequate food, clothing, medical aid, or lodging for his child being in his custody under the age of fourteen, whereby the health of such child shall have been or shall be likely to be seriously injured (f). This section was repealed in 1889 by 52 & 53 Vict. c. 44, which by sect. 1 made it a misdemeanor for

'This case is open to doubt on the ground that it seems to make the question, whether the act of the prisoner was a battery or not, depend on the result of that act; whereas, it is conceived that that act was either a battery or not a battery at the moment it was committed. It is confidently submitted that the instant a mother deposits a child with intent to abandon it, as that is an unlawful act, which she can neither justify nor excuse, she is guilty of battery. C. S. G.

a person over sixteen, having the custody, control, or charge of a child under sixteen wilfully to ill-treat, neglect, abandon, or exposes such child in a manner likely to cause such child unnecessary suffering or injury to its health.

The Act of 1889 was repealed in 1894 and re-enacted without alteration as sect. 1 (1) of 57 & 58 Vict. c. 41.

Sect. 1 (1) of the Act of 1894 was repealed in 1904 and re-enacted without alteration as sect. 1 (1) of 4 Edw. VII. c. 15.

The Acts of 1889, 1894, and 1904 contain no reference to medical aid ; but in R. v. Senior (g) deliberate omission to obtain necessary medical or surgical aid was held to fall within the words 'likely to cause unnecessary suffering, &c.'

Sect. 1 of the Act of 1904 was in 1908 repealed and re-enacted as sect. 12 of the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67), in which section reference to medical aid is again introduced (sub-sect. 1).

Part II. of the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67), deals with the prevention of cruelty to children and young persons.

By sect. 12, '(1) If any person over the age of sixteen years, who has the custody, charge, or care (h) of any child or young person, wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes such child or young person, or causes or procures such child or young person to be assaulted, ill-treated (i), neglected, abandoned, or exposed, in a manner likely to cause such child or young person unnecessary suffering or injury to his health (including injury to or loss of sight, or hearing, or limb, or organ of the body, and any mental derangement), that person shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable—

(a) on conviction on indictment, to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds, or alternatively, or in default of payment of such fine, or in addition thereto, to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years ; and

(b) on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding twenty-five pounds, or alternatively, or in default of payment of such fine, or in addition thereto, to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding six months (j) ;

and for the purposes of this section a parent or other person legally liable to maintain a child or young person shall be deemed to have neglected him in a manner likely to cause injury to his health if he fails to provide adequate food, clothing, medical aid, or lodging for the child or young person, or if, being unable otherwise to provide such food, clothing, medical aid, or lodging, he fails to take steps to procure the same to be provided under the Acts relating to the relief of the poor (k).

'(2) A person may be convicted of an offence under this section, either on indictment or by a Court of summary jurisdiction, notwithstanding that actual suffering or injury to health, or the likelihood of such suffering or injury to health, was obviated by the action of another person.

‘(3) A person may be convicted of an offence under this section, either on indictment or by a Court of summary jurisdiction, notwithstanding the death of the child or young person in respect of whom the offence is committed (l).

‘(4) Upon the trial of any person over the age of sixteen indicted for the manslaughter of a child or young person of whom he had the custody charge or care, it shall be lawful for the jury, if they are satisfied that the accused is guilty of an offence under this section in respect of such child or young person, to find the accused guilty of such offence’ (m).

In R. v. Connor [1908] 2 K.B. 26, it was held that the mere omission by a father to pay any part of his earnings towards the support of his child might constitute wilful neglect within 4 Edw. VII. c. 15, s. 1, although the child was living with its mother and the father was living apart from her. In Cole v. Pendleton (60 J.P. 359), where the father was living with his wife, a similar ruling was given.

By sub-sect. (5), ‘If it is proved that a person convicted under this section was directly or indirectly interested in any sum of money accruable or payable in the event of the death of the child or young person, and had knowledge that such sum of money was accruing or becoming payable, then

(a) in the case of a conviction on indictment, the Court may in its discretion either increase the amount of the fine under this section so that the fine does not exceed two hundred pounds; or, in lieu of awarding any other penalty under this section, sentence the person to penal servitude for any term not exceeding five years (n); and

(b) in the case of a summary conviction, the Court in determining the sentence to be awarded shall take into consideration the fact that the person was so interested and had such knowledge (o).

‘(6) A person shall be deemed to be directly or indirectly interested in a sum of money under this section, if he has any share in or any benefit from the payment of that money, though he is not a person to whom it is legally payable (p).

‘(7) A copy of a policy of insurance, certified by an officer or agent of the insurance company granting the policy, to be a true copy, shall in any proceedings under this section be prima facie evidence that the child or young person therein stated to be insured has been in fact so insured, and that the person in whose favour the policy has been granted is the person to whom the money thereby insured is legally payable (q).

‘(8) An offence under this section is in this part of this Act referred to as an offence of cruelty.’

By sect. 13 (r), 'Where it is proved that the death of an infant under three years of age was caused by suffocation (not being suffocation caused by disease or the presence of any foreign body in the throat or air passages of the infant), whilst the infant was in bed with some other person over sixteen years of age, and that that other person was at the time of going to bed under the influence of drink, that other person shall be deemed to have neglected the infant in a manner likely to cause injury to its health within the meaning of this part of this Act.'

Sect. 19 (based on 4 Edw. VII. c. 15, s. 4) provides for the arrest by a constable for offences under this part of the Act or within Sched. 1, post, committed in his view or persons who have committed or are reasonably suspected of having committed such offences if the constable cannot get their names and addresses or has reasonable ground for believing that they will abscond.

Sect. 20 provides for the detention in a place of safety of children or young persons against whom such offences have been committed or there is reason to believe have been committed.

By sect. 21, '(1) Where a person having the custody charge or care of a child or young person has been—

- (a) convicted of committing in respect of such child or young person an offence under this part of this Act or any of the offences mentioned in the First Schedule to this Act ; or
- (b) committed for trial for any such offence ; or
- (c) bound over to keep the peace towards such child or young person, by any Court, that Court, either at the time when the person is so convicted, committed for trial, or bound over, and without requiring any new proceedings to be instituted for the purpose, or at any other time, and also any petty sessional Court before which any person may bring the case, may, if satisfied on inquiry that it is expedient so to deal with the child or young person, order that the child or young person be taken out of the custody, charge, or care of the person so convicted, committed for trial, or bound over, and be committed to the care of a relative of the child or young person, or some other fit person, named by the Court (such relative or other person being willing to undertake such care), until he attains the age of sixteen years, or for any shorter period, and that Court or any Court of like jurisdiction may of its own motion, or on the application of any person, from time to time by order renew, vary, and revoke any such order (s).

'(2) If the child or young person has a parent or legal guardian no order shall be made under this section unless the parent or legal guardian has been convicted of or committed for trial for the offence, or is under committal for trial for having been, or has been proved to the satisfaction of the Court making the order to have been, party or privy to the offence,

or has been bound over to keep the peace towards the child or young person, or cannot be found (t).

‘(3) Every order under this section shall be in writing, and any such order may be made by the Court in the absence of the child or young person; and the consent of any person to undertake the care of a child or young person in pursuance of any such order shall be proved in such manner as the Court may think sufficient to bind him.

‘(4) Where an order is made under this section in respect of a person who has been committed for trial, then, if that person is acquitted of the charge, or if the charge is dismissed for want of prosecution, the order shall forthwith be void, except with regard to anything that may have been lawfully done under it (u).

‘(7) Nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing the Court, instead of making an order as respects a child under this section, from ordering the child to be sent to an industrial school in any case in which the Court is authorised to do so under Part IV. of this Act (v).

By sect. 22 ‘(1) Any person to whose care a child or young person is committed under this part of this Act shall, whilst the order is in force, have the like control over the child or young person as if he were his parent, and shall be responsible for his maintenance, and the child or young person shall continue in the care of such person, notwithstanding that he is claimed by his parent or any other person, and if any person

(a) Knowingly assists or induces, directly or indirectly, a child or young person to escape from the person to whose care he is so committed; or

(b) Knowingly harbours, conceals, or prevents from returning to such person, a child or young person who has so escaped, or knowingly assists in so doing;

he shall on summary conviction be liable to a fine not exceeding £20 or to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two months.

‘(2) Any Court having power so to commit a child or young person shall have power to make the like orders on the parent or other person liable to maintain the child or young person to contribute to his maintenance during such period as aforesaid, and such orders shall be enforceable in like manner as if the child or young person were ordered to be sent to a certified school (w) under Part IV. of this Act, but the limit on the amount of the weekly sum which the parent or such other person may be required under this section to contribute shall be one pound a week instead of the limit fixed under Part IV.

‘(3) Any such order may be made on the complaint or application of the person to whose care the child or young person is for the time being committed, and either at the time when the order for the committal of the child or young person to his care is made, or subsequently, and the sums contributed by the parent or such other person shall be paid to such person as the Court may name, and be applied for the maintenance of the child or young person.

‘(4) Where an order under this part of this Act to commit a child or young person to the care of some relative or other person is made in respect of a person who has been committed for trial for an offence, the Court shall not have power to make an order under this section on the parent or other person liable to maintain the child or young person prior to the trial of the person so committed.

‘(5) Any Court making an order under this section for contribution by a parent or such other person may in any case where there is any pension or income payable to such parent or other person and capable of being attached, after giving the person by whom the pension or income is payable an opportunity of being heard, further order that such part as the Court may see fit of the pension or income be attached and be paid to the person named by the Court. Such further order shall be an authority to the person by whom such pension or other income is payable to make the payment so ordered, and the receipt of the person to whom the payment is ordered to be made shall be a good discharge to such first-mentioned person.

‘(6) An order under this section may be made by any Court before which a person is charged with an offence under this part of this Act, and without regard to the place in which the person to whom the payment is ordered to be made may reside’ (x).

By sect. 23 (y), ‘(1) In determining on the person to whose care the child or young person shall be committed under this part of this Act, the Court shall endeavour to ascertain the religious persuasion to which the child or young person belongs, and shall, if possible, select a person of the same religious persuasion, or a person who gives such undertaking as seems to the Court sufficient that the child or young person shall be brought up in accordance with its own religious persuasion, and such religious persuasion shall be specified in the order.

‘(2) In any case where the child or young person has been placed pursuant to any such order with a person who is not of the same religious persuasion as that to which the child or young person belongs, or who has not given such undertaking as aforesaid, the Court which made the order, or any Court of like jurisdiction, shall, on the application of any person in that behalf, and on its appearing that a fit person, who is of the same religious persuasion, or who will give such undertaking as aforesaid, is willing to undertake the care of the child or young person, make an order to secure his being placed with a person who either is of the same religious persuasion or gives such undertaking as aforesaid.

‘(3) Where a child or young person has been placed with a person who gives such undertaking as aforesaid, and the undertaking is not observed, the child or young person shall be deemed to have been placed with a person not of the same religious persuasion as that to which the child belongs, as if no such undertaking had been given (z).

By sect. 26, 'Where it appears to the Court by or before which any person is convicted of an offence of cruelty, or of any of the offences mentioned in the First Schedule to this Act, that that person is a parent of the child or young person in respect of whom the offence was committed, or is living with the parent of the child or young person, and is a habitual drunkard within the meaning of the Inebriates Acts, 1879 to 1900 (a), the Court, in lieu of sentencing that person to imprisonment, may, if it thinks fit, make an order for his detention in a retreat under the said Acts, the licensee of which is willing to receive him, for any period named in the order, not exceeding two years, and the order shall have the like effect, and copies thereof shall be sent to the local authority and Secretary of State in like manner, as if it were an application duly made by that person and duly attested by a justice under the said Acts; and the Court may order an officer of the Court or constable to remove that person to the retreat, and on his reception the said Acts shall have effect as if he had been admitted in pursuance of an application so made and attested as aforesaid: Provided that—

- (a) an order for the detention of a person in a retreat shall not be made under this section unless that person, having had such notice as the Court deems sufficient of the intention to allege habitual drunkenness, consents to the order being made; and
- (b) if the wife or husband of such person, being present at the hearing of the charge, objects to the order being made, the Court shall, before making the order, take into consideration any representation made to it by the wife or husband; and
- (c) before making the order the Court shall, to such extent as it may deem reasonably sufficient, be satisfied that provision will be made for defraying the expenses of such person during detention in a retreat; and
- (d) nothing in this section shall affect any power of the Court to order the person convicted to be detained in a certified inebriate reformatory (b).

Evidence and Procedure.—By sect. 27, 'As respects proceedings against any person for an offence under this part of this Act, or for any of the offences mentioned in the First Schedule to this Act, the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898 (c), shall apply as if in the schedule to that Act a reference to this part of this Act and to the First Schedule of this Act were substituted for the reference to the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894 (d).

(b) in any other case, to the clerk of the peace of the county or borough in which the deposition has been taken; and the clerk of the peace to whom any such deposition is transmitted shall preserve, file, and record the deposition’ (e).

By sect. 29, ‘Where, on the trial of any person on indictment for an offence of cruelty, or any of the offences mentioned in the First Schedule to this Act, the Court is satisfied by the evidence of a duly qualified medical practitioner that the attendance before the Court of any child or young person in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed would involve serious danger to the life or health of the child or young person, any deposition of the child or young person taken under the Indictable Offences Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42) or this part of this Act, shall be admissible in evidence either for or against the accused person without further proof thereof—

(a) if it purports to be signed by the justice by or before whom it purports to be taken; and

(b) if it is proved that reasonable notice of the intention to take the deposition has been served upon the person against whom it is proposed to use it as evidence, and that that person or his counsel or solicitor had, or might have had if he had chosen to be present, an opportunity of cross-examining the child or young person making the deposition (f).

Provided that—

- (a) A person shall not be liable to be convicted of the offence unless the testimony admitted by virtue of this section and given on behalf of the prosecution is corroborated by some other material evidence in support thereof implicating the accused (hh); and
- (b) Any child, whose evidence is received as aforesaid and who wilfully gives false evidence under such circumstances that, if the evidence had been given on oath, he would have been guilty of perjury, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be liable on summary conviction to be adjudged such punishment as might have been awarded had he been charged with perjury and the case dealt with summarily under section ten of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (i).

By sect. 31, 'Where in any proceedings with relation to an offence under this part of this Act, or any of the offences mentioned in the First Schedule to this Act, the Court is satisfied that the attendance before the Court of any child or young person in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed is not essential to the just hearing of the case, the case may be proceeded with and determined in the absence of the child or young person' (j).

By sect. 32, '(1) Where a person is charged with committing an offence under this part of this Act, or any of the offences mentioned in the First Schedule to this Act, in respect of two or more children or young persons, the same information or summons may charge the offence in respect of all or any of them, but the person charged shall not be liable to a separate penalty for each child or young person except upon separate informations.

'(2) The same information or summons may also charge any person as having the custody, charge, or care, alternatively or together, and may charge him with the offences of assault, ill-treatment, neglect, abandonment, or exposure, together or separately, and may charge him with committing all or any of these offences in a manner likely to cause unnecessary suffering or injury to health, alternatively or together, but when those offences are charged together the person charged shall not be liable to a separate penalty for each (k).

evidence may be taken of acts constituting, or contributing to constitute, the offence, and committed at any previous time.

‘(4) When an offence under this part of this Act, or any offence mentioned in the First Schedule to this Act, charged against any person is a continuous offence, it shall not be necessary to specify in the information, summons, or indictment, the date of the acts constituting the offence’ (l).

By sect. 33, ‘When, in pursuance of this part of this Act, any person is convicted by a Court of summary jurisdiction of an offence, or when in the case of any application to a Court of summary jurisdiction under this part of this Act for an order committing a child or young person to the care of any person, or for an order for contribution to the maintenance of a child or young person, any party thereto thinks himself aggrieved by any order or decision of the Court, he may appeal against such a conviction, or order, or decision to quarter sessions (m).

By sect. 34 ‘(1) A board of guardians may institute any proceedings under this part of this Act for any offence in relation to a child or young person and may, out of their common fund, pay the reasonable costs and expenses of any proceedings so instituted by them (n).

‘(2) The like powers of instituting proceedings may, in London, be also exercised by a local authority for the purposes of Part I of this Act, and the expenses of such proceedings shall be defrayed as expenses of the authority under Part I’ (o).

By sect. 35, ‘Every misdemeanor under this part of this Act shall be deemed to be an offence within, and subject to, the provisions of the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859 (p), and any Act amending that Act’ (q).

By sect. 36, ‘Section ten of the Poor Law Act, 1879, shall be amended so as to include in it as one of the associations or societies to which a board of guardians may, with the consent of the Local Government Board, subscribe, any society or body corporate for the prevention of cruelty to children.’

By sect. 37, ‘Nothing in this part of this Act shall be construed to take away or affect the right of any parent, teacher, or other person having the lawful control or charge of a child or young person to administer punishment to such child or young person’ (r).

Interpretation.—By sect. 38, ‘(1) In this Part of this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the expression “fit person,” in relation to the care of any child or young person, includes any society or body corporate established for the reception or protection of poor children or the prevention of cruelty to children.

person, or who is legally liable to maintain a child or young person, shall be presumed to have the custody of the child or young person, and as between father and mother the father shall not be deemed to have ceased to have the custody of the child or young person by reason only that he has deserted, or otherwise does not reside with, the mother and child or young person ; and

‘ Any person to whose charge a child or young person is committed by any person who has the custody of the child or young person shall be presumed to have charge of the child or young person ; and

‘ Any other person having actual possession or control of a child or young person shall be presumed to have the care of the child or young person.

(3) ‘ This part of this Act shall apply in the place of a child or young person who has before the commencement of this Act been committed to the care of a relative or other fit person, by an order made under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904’ (4 Edw. VII. c. 15), ‘ as if the order had been made under this part of this Act.’

By sect. 123, ‘ Where a person, whether charged with an offence or not, is brought before any Court otherwise than for the purpose of giving evidence, and it appears to the Court that he is a child or young person, the Court shall make due inquiry as to the age of that person, and for that purpose shall take such evidence as may be forthcoming at the hearing of the case, but an order or judgment of the Court shall not be invalidated by any subsequent proof that the age of that person has not been correctly stated to the Court, and the age presumed or declared by the Court to be the age of the person so brought before it shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be the true age of that person, and, where it appears to the Court that the person so brought before it is of the age of sixteen years or upwards, that person shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed not to be a child or young person.

‘ (2) Where in a charge or indictment for an offence under this Act, or any of the offences mentioned in the First Schedule to this Act, except an offence under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (s), it is alleged that the person by or in respect of whom the offence was committed was a child or young person or was under or above any specified age, and he appears to the Court to have been at the date of the commission of the alleged offence a child or young person, or to have been under or above the specified age, as the case may be, he shall for the purposes of this Act be presumed at that date to have been a child or young person or to have been under or above that age, as the case may be, unless the contrary is proved (t).

‘ (3) Where in any charge or indictment for an offence under this Act or any of the offences mentioned in the First Schedule to this Act it is alleged that the person in respect of whom the offence was committed was a child or was a young person, it shall not be a defence to prove that the person alleged to have been a child was a young person or the person alleged to have been a young person was a child in any case where the acts constituting the alleged offence would equally have been an offence if committed in respect of a young person or child respectively.

‘(4) Where a person is charged with an offence under this Act in respect of a person apparently under a specified age it shall be a defence to prove that the person was actually of or over that age.’

By sect. 131, ‘For the purposes of this Act unless the context otherwise requires—

- ‘The expression “child” means a person under the age of fourteen years (u) ;
- ‘The expression “young person” means a person who is fourteen years of age or upwards and under the age of sixteen years ;
- ‘The expression “guardian” in relation to a child, young person, or youthful offender, includes any person who, in the opinion of the Court having cognisance of any case in relation to the child, young person, or youthful offender, or in which the child, young person, or youthful offender is concerned, has for the time being the charge of or control over the child, young person, or youthful offender ;
- ‘The expression “legal guardian” in relation to an infant, child, young person, or youthful offender, means a person appointed, according to law, to be his guardian by deed or will, or by order of a Court of competent jurisdiction ;
- ‘The expression “place of safety” means any workhouse or police station, or any hospital, surgery, or any other suitable place, the occupier of which is willing temporarily to receive an infant, child, or young person ;
- ‘The expression “common council” means the mayor, aldermen, and commons of the City of London in common council assembled ;
- ‘The expression “local education authority” means a local education authority for the purpose of Part III. of the Education Act, 1902’ (2 Edw. VII. c. 42) ;
- ‘The expressions “police authority” and “police fund” as respects the City of London mean the Common Council and the fund out of which the expenses of the City police are defrayed, and elsewhere have the same meanings as in the Police Act, 1890’ (53 & 54 Vict. c. 45) ;
- ‘The expression “common fund” means, as respects a poor law union consisting of a single parish, the poor rate of that parish ;
- ‘The expression “street” includes any highway and any public bridge, road, lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage; whether a thoroughfare or not ;
- ‘The expression “public place” includes any public park, garden, sea beach, or railway station, and any ground to which the public for the time being have or are permitted to have access, whether on payment or otherwise ;

(u) By s. 128 (1) ‘fourteen’ is substituted for ‘twelve’ in the definition of child and young person in the Summary

Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), and the first schedule of that Act is amended.

'The expression "intoxicating liquor" means any fermented, distilled, or spirituous liquor which cannot according to any law for the time being in force be legally sold without a licence from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.'

FIRST SCHEDULE.

Any offence under sections twenty-seven (v), fifty-five (w), or fifty-six (x) of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), and any offence against a child or young person under sections five (y) forty-two, forty-three (z), fifty-two (a), or sixty-two (b) of that Act, or under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69) (c).

Any offence under the Dangerous Performances Acts, 1879 and 1897 (d).

Any other offence involving bodily injury to a child or young person (e).

SECT. VI.—OF OFFENCES WITH REFERENCE TO LUNATICS.

Besides the general provisions of the criminal law with regard to crimes irrespective of the mental condition of the person affected by the crime, there are a number of special enactments punishing offences with reference to lunatics.

A. Common Law.

The ill-treatment of a lunatic by a person having duties towards him by status or contract seems at common law to fall within the rule as to sick or helpless persons (ante, pp. 667, 678) (f). It would seem that to justify conviction for neglect of a person of unsound mind as for a common law misdemeanor it is necessary directly to aver and to prove that the lunatic was under the control and care of the defendant or that the defendant was under some duty to take care of the lunatic, that the neglect occurred while the care and control continued, and that the neglect was of a character to produce serious injury to the health of the lunatic, and in fact caused such injury (g).

(x) Child-stealing, ante, p. 904.

(y) Manslaughter, ante, p. 779.

(z) Assaults, ante, p. 896.

(a) Indecent assault, post, p. 955.

(b) Infamous crime, post, p. 975.

(c) Post, pp. 948 et seq. (d) Ante, p. 910.

(e) See Lord Advocate v. Fraser, 3 Fraser, Justiciary (Sc.) 67. R. v. Roberts, 18 Cox, 530.

(f) 'As a person incapable of taking care of himself through imbecility of mind, is in contemplation of law in the same situation as an infant (R. v. Much Cowarne, 2 B. & Ad. 861), it would seem that if a person, who is the parent, or has the actual custody of a lunatic, neglects to provide for such lunatic, though more than twenty-one years of age, whereby his health is injured, such person would be indictable in the same manner as if the lunatic were a child of such tender years as to be unable to provide for and take care of itself. See

R. v. Friend, R. & R. 20, vide ante, p. 907. C. S. G. And see Buchanan v. Hardy, 18 Q. B. D. 486.

(g) R. v. Pelham, 8 Q. B. 959, where an indictment of a mother for neglect of her illegitimate lunatic son was held to be defective. It charged unlawful confinement in an unwholesome room, neglect to clothe the lunatic and suffering him to be covered with filth, and possession of sufficient means for properly caring for him. Such an offence is now covered by 53 & 54 Vict. c. 5, s. 322, post, p. 929. In R. v. Smith, 2 C. & P. 449, Burrough, J., held that it was not an indictable offence in a brother to neglect to maintain another brother, even though he was an idiot, helpless and an inmate of the defendant's house. The idiot was bed-ridden and was kept in a dark room without sufficient warmth or clothing, and so to keep him was held to be neither an assault nor false imprisonment. See R. v. Marriott, 8 C. & P. 425 Patterson, J., ante, p. 678.

B. Statutes.

(i.) CRIMINAL LUNATICS.—By the Criminal Lunatic Asylums Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 75) s. 13, ‘Any superintendent, officer, nurse, attendant, servant, or other person employed in any asylum for criminal lunatics, who strikes, wounds, ill-treats, or wilfully neglects any person confined therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject to indictment for every such offence, and, on conviction under the indictment, to fine or imprisonment, with or without hard labour, or to both fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the Court, or to forfeit for every such offence, on summary conviction thereof before two justices, any sum not exceeding twenty pounds nor less than two pounds.’

The treatment of criminal lunatics (h) is further regulated by the Criminal Lunatics Acts of 1838 (1 & 2 Vict. c. 14) & 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 64) which extends to lunatic prisoners removed from the Colonies or India (14 & 15 Vict. c. 81 ; 47 & 48 Vict. c. 3).

(ii.) OTHER LUNATICS.—The other statutory offences against lunatics are for the most part contained in the Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5). That Act and the Lunacy Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 65) contain regulations for the care and treatment of lunatics other than criminal lunatics, and for the licensing of houses for the reception of lunatics.

By sect. 341 of the Act of 1890, ‘In this Act if not inconsistent with the context—“Asylum” means an asylum for lunatics provided by a county or borough, or by a union of counties or boroughs.’ . . .

“Hospital” means any hospital or part of a hospital or other house or institution not being an asylum where lunatics are received and supported wholly or partly by voluntary contributions or by any charitable bequest or gift only applying the excess of payments by some patients for or towards the support, provision, or benefit of other patients.’ . . .

“Institution for lunatics” means an asylum, hospital, or licensed house’ (i). . . .

“Lunatic” means an idiot or person of unsound mind’ (j). . . .

“Manager” in relation to an institution for lunatics, means the superintendent of an asylum, the resident medical officer or superintendent of a hospital, and the resident licensee of a licensed house.’

By sect. 7 (4), ‘If after a petition’ (for a reception order) ‘has been dismissed, another petition is presented as to the same alleged lunatic, the person presenting such other petition, so far as he has any knowledge or information with reference to the previous petition and its dismissal, shall state the facts relating thereto in his petition, and shall obtain from the (h) Defined in s. 16 of the Act of 1884 for the purposes of that Act.

(i) Licensed houses are governed by ss. 207-229 of the Act: ‘workhouses’ are governed by ss. 24-27 of the Act of 1890 and by ss. 4, 6, 19 of the Act of 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 65).

(j) Vide ante, pp. 64 et seq. The definition is for purposes of management and control of persons and their property by the judge in lunacy extended (s. 116). In R. v. Shaw, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 145, it was held that imbecility and loss of mental power, whether arising from natural decay or from paralysis, softening of the brain, or other natural cause, and although unaccompanied by frenzy or delusion, constituted unsoundness of mind within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, of which the Act of 1890 is to a large extent a re-enactment.

commissioners at his own expense, and present with the petition a copy of the statement sent to them of the reasons for dismissing the previous petition, and if he wilfully omits to comply with this subsection he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 8, provision is made for the right of a lunatic received as a private patient to be examined by a judicial authority, and for notice being given of his reception, and for notice to the patient of his right to have an interview with the judicial authority and give him an opportunity of making a request for interview and transmitting it when made, and producing the certificate on which the patient was received. By subsect. 5, 'If any manager of an institution for lunatics, or any person having charge of a single patient, omits to perform any duty imposed upon him by this section he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 38 (7), 'The manager of any institution for lunatics and any person having charge of a single patient, who detains a patient (k) after he has knowledge that the order for his reception (l) has expired shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 40 (1), 'Mechanical means (m) of bodily restraint shall not be applied to any lunatic unless the restraint is necessary for the purposes of surgical or medical treatment, or to prevent the lunatic from injuring himself or others' in which case a certificate of the grounds for using such restraint shall be given (sub-sects. 2, 3), and a record of it shall be kept and transmitted to the commissioners quarterly (sub-sects. 4, 5). By subsect. 7, 'Any person who wilfully acts in contravention of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 44 (4), 'If any person having charge of a single patient fails to give effect to any direction of the commissioners under this sect.' (as to visits by a medical practitioner) 'he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 76 (2), 'Any person who has been duly served with any such order of discharge (n), and detains a patient after the date of discharge appointed thereby, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor' (o).

By sect. 158 (3), 'Any disqualified person (p) continuing to act (as commissioner or secretary or clerk to the commissioners) shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 177 (5), 'Any disqualified person (q) continuing to act' (as visitor or clerk or assistant clerk to any visitor) 'shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

Concealment of Buildings, Persons, or Facts from Official Visitors.—

(r) These words are defined in s. 341.

conceals or attempts to conceal or refuses or wilfully neglects to show any part of the building, or any building communicating therewith or detached therefrom but not separated as aforesaid (s) or any part of the ground or appurtenances held, used, or occupied therewith, or any person detained or being therein, from any one or more of the visiting commissioners or visitors, or from any person authorised under this Act to visit and inspect the hospital or house, or the patients therein or any of them, or who does not give full and true answers to the best of his knowledge to all questions which any visiting commissioner or visitor asks in the execution of his office, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 200 (2), 'If the person having charge of a single patient refuses to shew to any commissioner, at his request, any part of the house wherein the single patient resides, or any part of the grounds belonging thereto, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 214, 'If any person, for the purpose of obtaining a licence or the renewal of a licence for a house for the reception of lunatics, wilfully supplies to the commissioners or justices any untrue or incorrect information, plan, description, statement, or notice, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 222, 'If after the lapse of two months from the expiration or revocation of the licence of any house, there are in the house two or more lunatics, every person keeping the house or having the care or charge of lunatics therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 231 (10), 'The superintendent of any hospital' (ante, p. 925), 'who receives or detains any lunatic in the hospital contrary to the provisions of this Act or to the terms of the complete certificate of registration, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 233 (2), 'If the superintendent of a registered hospital knowingly permits any lunatic to be detained or lodged in any building not shewn on the plans of the hospital sent to the commissioners, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 237 (4), 'If any lunatics are detained or kept in the hospital (t) after the date appointed by the order for closing the hospital, the superintendent of the hospital shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.'

By sect. 315 (1), 'Every person who, except under the provisions of this Act, receives or detains a lunatic (u), or alleged lunatic (v), in an institution for lunatics, or for payment (w) takes charge of, receives to board or lodge, or detains a lunatic or alleged lunatic in an unlicensed house, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in the latter case shall also be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds.

(s) By ground belonging to any other person. S. 194 (1).

(t) i.e. a registered hospital which the commissioners have ordered to be closed under s. 237 sub-s. 1-3.

(u) i.e. as a lunatic and to be subjected to treatment ejusdem generis with that given to lunatics in public asylums. R. v. Bishop, 5 Q.B.D. 259. R. v. Sharrard [1894], noted in Wood-Renton on Lunacy, 674, 675.

(v) As to the meaning of lunatic see R. v. Shaw, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 145, ante, p. 925, note (i).

(w) The former Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 100), s. 90 had the words 'for profit.' Under those words if the payment made was not high enough to give a profit the defendant might have been entitled to acquittal. See R. v. Vollen [1872], 28th Rep. of Lunacy Commissioners, 73.

‘ (2) Except under the provisions of this Act, it shall not be lawful for any person to receive or detain two or more lunatics in any house unless the house is an institution for lunatics or workhouse.

‘ (3) Any person who receives or detains two or more lunatics in any house, except as aforesaid, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor ’ (x).

By sect. 316, ‘ The manager of any hospital or licensed house, and any person having charge of a single patient who omits to send to the commissioners the prescribed documents and information upon the admission of a patient, or to make the prescribed entries, and give the prescribed notices upon the removal, discharge, or death of a patient, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in the case of a single patient shall also be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds ’ (y).

By sect. 317 (1), ‘ Any person who makes a wilful misstatement of any material fact in any petition, statement of particulars, or reception order under this Act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

‘ (2) Any person who makes a wilful misstatement of any material fact in any medical or other certificate, or in any statement or report of bodily or mental condition under this Act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

‘ (3) A prosecution for a misdemeanor under this section shall not take place except by order of the commissioners, or by the direction of the Attorney-General or the Director of Public Prosecutions ’ (z).

By sect. 318, ‘ Any person who in any book, statement, or return knowingly makes any false entry as to any matter as to which he is by this Act or any rules made under this Act required to make any entry shall be guilty of a misdemeanor ’ (a).

By sect. 319, ‘ If the manager of an institution for lunatics, or the person having charge of a single patient, omits to send to the coroner notice of the death of a lunatic within the prescribed time (b), he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.’

By sect. 321 (1), ‘ Any person who obstructs any Commissioner, or Chancery or other visitor, in the exercise of the powers conferred by this or any other Act, shall for each offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds, and shall also be guilty of a misdemeanor.

‘ (2), Any person who wilfully obstructs any other person authorised under this Act by an order in writing under the hand of the Lord Chancellor, or a Secretary of State, to visit and examine any lunatic or supposed lunatic, or to inspect or inquire into the state of any institution for lunatics, gaol, or place wherein any lunatic or person represented to be a lunatic is confined or alleged to be confined, in the execution of such order, and any person who wilfully obstructs any person authorised under this Act by any order of the commissioners to make any visit and examination or inquiry, in the execution of such order, shall (without prejudice to any

(x) It was decided on the corresponding section (44) of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100 to be no defence that the person so receiving the lunatics honestly and reasonably believed that they were not lunatics. *R. v. proceedings, and in addition to any punishment to which such person obstructing the execution of such order would otherwise be subject) be liable for every such offence to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.'

By sect. 322, 'If any manager, officer, nurse, attendant, servant, or other person employed in an institution for lunatics, or any person having charge of a lunatic, whether by reason of any contract, or of any tie of relationship, or marriage, or otherwise (c) ill-treats or wilfully neglects a patient, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction on indictment, shall be liable to fine or imprisonment, or to both fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the Court, or be liable on summary conviction for every offence to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, nor less than two pounds.'

Sect. 324. Carnal knowledge of female lunatics by officials, &c. Vide post, p. 947.

Prosecution and Procedure.—By sect. 325 (1), 'Except as by this Act otherwise provided, proceedings against any persons for offences against this Act may be taken—

'(a) By the secretary of the commissioners upon their order for any offence ;

'(b) By the clerk of the visitors of any licensed house for an offence committed within their jurisdiction ;

'(c) By the clerk of the visiting committee of an asylum for any offence by any person employed therein.

'And such proceedings shall not abate by the death or removal of the prosecuting secretary or clerk, but the same may be continued by his successor, and in any such proceedings the prosecuting secretary or clerk shall be competent to be a witness.

'(2) Except as by this Act otherwise provided, it shall not be lawful to take such proceedings except by order of the commissioners, or of visitors having jurisdiction in the place where the offence was committed (d), or with the consent of the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General.'

By sect. 328, 'A Secretary of State on the report of the commissioners or visitors of any institution for lunatics may direct the Attorney-General to prosecute on the part of the Crown any person alleged to have committed a misdemeanor under this Act.'

Evidence.—By sect. 329 (1), 'Where any person is proceeded against under this Act, on any charge of omitting to transmit or send any copy, list, notice, statement, report, or other document required to be transmitted or sent by such person, the burden of proof that the same was

(c) In R. v. Rundle, Dears. 482, it was held that 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96, s. 9 did not cover the case of a husband ill-treating his lunatic wife. In R. v. Porter, 33 L. J. M. C. 126: 9 Cox, 449, it was held that persons who voluntarily undertook the charge of a lunatic were within that Act. In R. v. Smith [1880], 15 Cox, 399 (C. C. R.), the two brothers of a lunatic were held liable under that enactment for ill-treatment of a lunatic sister who lived with them, though they received no payment for or on account of any special charge of her. In Buchanan v. Hardy [1890], 18 Q.B.D. 486, R. v.

Rundle seems to have been virtually overruled. In the latter case it was held that parents had been properly convicted of ill-treating a lunatic daughter. The words italicised in the present enactment seem to make it clear that it applies to all cases of persons ill-treating lunatics in their charge. As to what is ill-treatment see Wood-Renton, Lunacy, 681, 682.

(d) In certain cases the time for prosecution may be limited by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61).

transmitted or sent within the time required shall lie upon such person : but if he proves by the testimony of one witness upon oath that the copy, list, notice, statement, report, or document in respect of which the proceeding is taken, was properly addressed and put into the post in due time or (in case of documents required to be sent to the commissioners, or a clerk of the peace, or a clerk to guardians) left at the office of the commissioners, or of the clerk of the peace, or clerk to the guardians, such proof shall be a bar to all further proceedings in respect of such charge (e).

‘(2) In proceedings under this Act where a question arises whether a house is or is not a licensed house or registered as a hospital, it shall be presumed not to be so licensed or registered unless the licence or certificate of registration is produced, or sufficient evidence is given that a licence or certificate is in force’ (e).

A lunatic may be received as a witness on any criminal charge if the Court considers him rational enough to be a competent witness (f).

Punishment.—The punishment for the above statutory misdemeanors is by fine or imprisonment without hard labour unless another punishment is prescribed by the enactment creating the offence (g).

(e) Under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100 there was some doubt as to the burden of proof in such cases. R v. Harris, 10 Cox, 541. There notice to produce the documents had been given to the defendant, and he had not produced them.

CANADIAN NOTES.

Sec. 2.—Ill-treatment of Apprentices and Servants.—Code sec. 243.
Punishment.—Code sec. 244.

This section was adopted from the Imperial Statute 24-44 Vict. ch. 100, sec. 26. The gist of the offence was the wilfully and without lawful excuse refusing or neglecting to provide. R. v. Nasmith, 42 U.C.Q.B. 242. The words of the Code constitute a mere omission an offence, if without lawful excuse.

This section does not impose a criminal responsibility upon the master to provide the servant with medical attendance or medicine. R. v. Coventry, 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 541.

The reason for the restriction (to those under sixteen) is, that adults may, if not provided with proper nourishment, remonstrate, and, if necessary, leave the service. R. v. Nasmith, 42 U.C.Q.B. 242.

In a case before the Code where a young farm-hand fifteen years of age died from gangrene resulting from frost-bites through exposure and neglect which the master could have obviated, it was held that, in view of the age of the deceased, the circumstances of the country, the fact of there being no provision for maintaining poor people, it was the duty of the prisoner, as a master towards the deceased as his servant, to have taken care of him, and that by his omission to do so he was guilty of gross negligence, to which the lad's death was attributable, and that, therefore, the prisoner was guilty of manslaughter. R. v. Brown (1893), 1 Terr. L.R. 475.

Causing Bodily Harm to Apprentices or Servants.—Code sec. 249.

A verdict for common assault is maintainable upon an indictment under this section. R. v. Bissonnette (1879), Ramsay's Cases (Que.) 190.

It is purely a question of fact whether the acts proved shew that the health is likely to be permanently injured; and the words "permanently injured" have no technical meaning as here used. R. v. Bowman (1898), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 410.

Sec. 5.—Of Cruelty to Children.

Duty of Head of Family to Provide Necessaries.—Code sec. 242.

Punishment.—Code sec. 244.

Abandoning.—Code sec. 245.

Head of Family.—A person who engages the services of a child under sixteen years, placed out with him by his legal guardian under a contract for the child's services for a fixed period, whereby the party with whom he is placed engages to furnish the child with board, lodging, clothing, and necessaries, is not as to such child a "guardian or head of a family" so as to become criminally responsible as such, under section 242, for omitting to provide "necessaries" to such child while a member of his household. The relationship in such case is that of master and servant, and comes within the provisions of sec. 243, under which the master is criminally responsible only in respect of a failure to provide "necessary food, clothing, or lodging." R. v. Coventry, 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 541.

Without Lawful Excuse.—It must be shewn that the parent or guardian was in the actual possession of means to provide for the child. R. v. Robinson (1897), 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 28.

Permanently Injured.—It is purely a question of fact whether the acts proved are such that the health of the person is likely to be permanently injured by reason thereof; and the words "permanently injured," as here used, have no technical meaning. R. v. Bowman (1898), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 410 (N.S.).

Where a child's toes were so badly frozen, through the neglect of the person in whose charge the child was, that they had to be amputated, it was held in the Territories that the Court should not without expert evidence upon the effect of the loss of the toes infer that the child's health had thereby been or was likely to be permanently injured, or that his life had thereby been endangered. R. v. Coventry, 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 541.

Sec. 6.—Of Offences with Reference to Lunatics.

Duty of Person in Charge of Lunatics to Provide Necessaries of Life.—Code sec. 241.

Punishment.—Code sec. 244.

Preservation of Life.—Sections 241 and 242 appear in the Code under the heading of "Duties Tending to the Preservation of Life." As such headings have the same effect as preambles to statutes, the terms "necessaries of life," and "necessaries" which occur in the respective sections, mean, when read in connection with the heading mentioned, such necessaries as tend to preserve life, and not necessaries in their ordinary legal sense. R. v. Brooks (1902), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 372, 9 B.C.R. 13.

CHAPTER THE NINTH.

OF RAPE, AND OF THE DEFILEMENT OR CORRUPTION OF FEMALES.

SECT. I.—OF RAPE.

THE definition of the crime of rape depends wholly on the common law as explained by judicial decisions. The crime consists in having unlawful carnal knowledge of a woman without her consent (a), i.e. her free and conscious permission (b). It is therefore an aggravated form of assault (bb). The older definitions described the offence as committed with violence, but as will be presently stated it is not necessary in all cases to prove actual violence.

This offence does not appear to have been regarded as equally heinous at all periods of our history. Anciently, indeed, it appears to have been punishable with death; but this was afterwards thought too hard; and in its stead, another severe but not capital punishment was inflicted by William the Conqueror, namely, castration and loss of eyes, which continued till after Bracton wrote, in the reign of Henry III. (c). The punishment for rape was still further mitigated, in the reign of Edward I., by the Statute of Westm. 1, 3 Edw. I. c. 13 (d), which reduced the offence to a trespass, and subjected the party to two years' imprisonment, and a fine at the King's will. This lenity, however, is said to have been productive of terrible consequences; and it was, therefore, found necessary, by 13 Edw. I. (stat. Westm. sec.) c. 34 (e), to make punishable by judgment of life and member the ravishing of a woman, whether married, maid or other, where she did not consent, neither before or after. The punishment was still further enhanced by 18 Eliz. c. 7, s. 1 (f). These statutes were repealed and superseded by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31 (E.) & 10 Geo. IV. c. 34 (I.). And by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 48 (g), 'Whosoever shall be convicted of the crime of rape shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . ' (h)

(h) The words omitted were repealed in 1892 (S. L. R.). By 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212, the minimum term of penal servitude is three years and imprisonment (with or without hard labour) for not over two years may be substituted. As to recognisances, vide ante, p. 218.

As to the punishment of principals in the second degree and accessories before and after the fact see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, & 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 67, ante, pp. 130, 133.

An indictment for rape may be prosecuted at any time, and notwithstanding any subsequent assent of the woman alleged to have been ravished (i).

All who are present, aiding and assisting a man to commit a rape, are principal offenders in the second degree, whether they be men or women (j).

Capacity.—The law presumes absolutely that a boy under the age of fourteen years is unable to commit the crime of rape; and, therefore, he cannot be guilty of it (k); or of an assault with intent to commit a rape (l); and if he be under fourteen no evidence is admissible to shew that he was in fact physically capable of sexual intercourse (m). This presumption, however, proceeds upon the grounds of impotency, rather than the want of discretion; and such infant may, therefore, be a principal in the second degree, as aiding and assisting in this offence, as well as in other felonies, if it appear, by sufficient circumstances, that he had a mischievous discretion (n).

There are conflicting dicta as to whether a male under fourteen can be convicted of an attempt to commit rape (o).

But it seems to be clear that a boy under fourteen may, on evidence which would warrant a conviction of an older male of rape be convicted of indecent assault (p) or simple assault (q).

It is said (r) that a husband cannot be guilty as a principal in the first degree of a rape on his wife, on account of the matrimonial consent which she has given and which she cannot retract. As to the correctness of this opinion there is some difference of judicial opinion.

In R. v. Clarence (s), Wills, J., said, 'If intercourse under the circumstances now in question constitutes an assault on the part of the man, it must constitute rape, unless indeed between married persons rape is impossible, a proposition as to which I certainly am not prepared to assent, and for which there seems to be no sufficient authority' (t). But Hale's view was accepted by A. L. Smith, J. (p. 37), Stephen, J. (p. 46),

(s) [1888] 22 Q.B.D. 23. In that case a husband was indicted for an assault on his wife causing grievous bodily harm, and the evidence was that he knowing that he was infected with a venereal disease (of which she was ignorant) he carnally knew her with her consent and infected her with the disease.

(t) Opinions to the same effect were expressed by Field, J. (p. 57).

and Hawkins, J. (p. 51). The last-named judge said that, 'the intercourse which takes place between husband and wife is not by virtue of any special consent on her part, but is mere submission to an obligation imposed on her by law. Consent is immaterial.' Upon this opinion he came to the conclusion that the act of the husband was not the less an assault because of the submission of the wife (u).

A husband may be guilty as a principal in the second degree to a rape on his wife by assisting another person to commit a rape upon her, for though in marriage the wife has given up her body to her husband, she is not by him to be prostituted to another (v): and a woman may be convicted as a principal in the second degree or as an accessory before the fact to a rape on another woman (w).

Carnal Knowledge.—There must be penetratio, or res in re in order to constitute the 'carnal knowledge,' which is a necessary part of the offences dealt with in this chapter (x). But a very slight penetration is sufficient (y). Thus in R. v. Russen (z), it was proved on behalf of a prisoner, who was charged with having ravished a young girl, that the passage of her parts was so narrow that a finger could not be introduced; and that the membrane called the hymen, which crosses the vagina, and is an indubitable mark of virginity, was perfectly whole and unbroken; but it was admitted that the hymen is in some cases an inch, and in others an inch and a half, beyond the orifice of the vagina (a). Ashhurst, J., left it to the jury to say whether any penetration were proved: and the judges afterwards held, upon a conference (De Grey, C.J., and Eyre, B., being absent), that this direction was perfectly right; and that the least degree of penetration is sufficient, though it may not be attended with the deprivation of the marks of virginity.

It is not essential to prove rupture of the hymen (b), but absence of evidence of rupture of the hymen makes it necessary to caution the jury to be careful about convicting of the complete offence (c).

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 63, 'Whenever, upon the trial for any offence punishable under this Act, it may be necessary to prove carnal knowledge, it shall not be necessary to prove the actual emission of seed in order to

(a) Upon this statement the reporters, in a note to R. v. Hughes, 9 C. & P. 752, observe, 'The first proposition appears to be much too strongly put, as several cases are mentioned by Dr. Davis (Elem. of Midw.

102), and Dr. Paris (1 Par. & Fonb. Med. Jur. 203), in which the hymen was entire during the pregnancy of the party, and in one case was obliged to be divided by a surgical operation at the time of the accouchement. With respect to the second proposition there may be some doubt, as in all the preparations in the museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, in which the hymen is shewn, it is not more than a quarter of an inch from the orifice of the vagina.' constitute a carnal knowledge, but the carnal knowledge shall be deemed complete upon proof of penetration only (d). A person may be convicted of rape, even if the fact of emission is negatived by the evidence (e).

Consent.—If a man has connection with a woman who is in a state of insensibility, knowing her to be in such state, he is guilty of rape, as the offence of rape is ravishing a woman where she did not consent (f), and not ravishing her against her will (g). Thus a man is guilty of a rape if he has connection with a woman when she is asleep, he knowing her to be so (h).

Where upon an indictment for rape the prosecutrix, a girl of thirteen, stated that she usually slept with the prisoner (her father) and having gone to sleep by his side, on awaking she found him having connection with her; the prisoner had had connection with her before, but she had never complained to anyone, nor would she of her own accord now, and a woman, who saw them together on the bed on the occasion in question, stated that the girl appeared to lie quiet for a moment while the prisoner was upon her, but on seeing the witness she immediately attempted to push him off. Coleridge, J., told the jury, 'The question is, was she a consenting party? and you cannot doubt, after the evidence you have heard, that, although not in a state to give consent when the connection began, she betrayed no disposition to resistance when she might have done so, and that, too, before the connection was at an end. She had been so treated before without complaining, nor would she, from her own statement, have complained now. I think, therefore, there is not such an absence of consent throughout as to justify a conviction of rape' (i).

A consent or submission obtained by fraud is, it would seem, not a defence to a charge of rape or cognate offences.

By the concluding clause of sect. 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), 'Whereas doubts (j) have been entertained

Before these enactments there were great authorities to shew that there need not have been emissio seminis in order to constitute a rape. 1 Hale, 628. 1 East, P. C. 438. R. v. Blomfield, 1 East, P. (i) R. v. Page, 2 Cox, 133.

(j) The doubts referred to arose out of the conflicting decisions in R. v. Barrow, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 156, and R. v. Dee, 14 L. R. (Ir.) 468; and of the disapproval of R. v. Barrow by some of the English judges in R. v. Flattery, 2 Q.B.D. 410. The enactment only applies where the woman is awake. The offence was in R. v. Williams, 8 C. & P. 286, held to be an assault. Cf. R. v. Saunders, ibid. p. 265. It is said to have been ruled in R. v. O'Shay, 19 Cox, whether a man who induces a married woman to permit him to have connection with her by personating her husband is or is not guilty of rape, it is hereby enacted and declared that every such offender shall be deemed to be guilty of rape.'

The question whether fraud as to the defendant's physical condition is sufficient to deprive him of the defence of consent has been fully discussed in R. v. Clarence (k) and elicited differences of opinion. But the rule accepted by the majority of the judges was that where the act is consented to with knowledge of its nature the fact that the defendant has concealed, or lied about, his physical condition, or the fact that bodily harm to the woman results from the act does not warrant the inference in law or fact that she did not consent to the act.

Force, Consent, Submission.—It is an essential element in the crime of rape that the woman should not be a consenting party at the time when the incriminating act is done. When the female is under sixteen, or is an imbecile, idiot, or lunatic, and in fact consents, the man is not guilty of rape, but is punishable under the enactments set out post, pp. 946 et seq.

Where a party took a woman by force, compelled her to marry him, and then had carnal knowledge of her by force, it appears to have been held that she could not maintain an appeal of rape against her husband, unless the marriage were first legally dissolved: but that when the marriage was made void ab initio by a declaratory sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court, the offence became punishable, as if there had been no marriage (l). As to carrying away a woman by force or fraud with intent to marry her, &c., see post, p. 968.

The offence of rape may be committed, though the woman at last yielded to the violence, if her consent was forced by fear of death or by duress (m). If non-resistance on the part of a prosecutrix proceeds merely from her being overpowered by actual force, or from her not being able, from want of strength, to resist any longer, or from the number of persons attacking her, she considered resistance dangerous, and absolutely useless, the crime is complete (n). And it is no excuse that she was first taken with her own consent, if she were afterwards forced against her will; nor is it an excuse that she consented after the fact, or that she was a common strumpet, or the concubine of the ravisher: for she is still under the protection of the law, and may not be forced (o). Circumstances of this kind, though they do not necessarily prevent the offence from amounting to a rape, are material to be left to the jury, in favour of the accused, especially in doubtful cases (p). The notion that, if the woman conceived, it could not be a rape, because she must in such case have consented, is exploded (q).

76, Ridley, J., that the effect of 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69 is to override R. v. Flattery and to establish that it is a good defence to a charge of rape to prove that consent was obtained by fraud; sed quære.

(k) 22 Q.B.D. 23, ante, p. 932. In this case doubts were thrown on the correctness of the decisions in R. v. Bennett, 4 F. & F. 1105, and R. v. Sinclair, 13 Cox, 28.

Submission without resistance is not necessarily tantamount to consent. The person assaulted may be too young to appreciate the nature of the act done or to do more than submit without actually consenting; and submission by a child in the hands of an older and stronger person, and possibly under the influence of fear or of a sense of constraining authority, is not equivalent to consent (r).

In R. v. Nichol (s), a master took very indecent liberties with a female scholar of the age of thirteen, by putting her hand into his breeches, pulling up her petticoats, and putting his private parts to hers: she did not resist, but it was against her will. The jury found him guilty of an assault with intent to commit a rape, and also of a common assault; and the judges thought the finding as to the latter clearly right (t).

In R. v. Jones (u), on the trial of a father for a rape on his daughter, aged fourteen years, it appeared that her father laid hold of her and had connection with her; he had previously told her not to tell anyone what he had done to her; he had said he would throttle her and kill her, if she told anything he had done; he had throttled her, and had had connection with her many times before; and on these occasions he had told her not to tell, and that was the reason she did not tell; she had consented to the prisoner's having connection with her because she was afraid of him; she was afraid of his choking her. Channell, B., told the jury that, 'if it is made out to your satisfaction that a kind of reign of terror was set up in this family, and in consequence of that terror and dread the girl allowed the connection to take place without resistance, then I am of opinion you may convict. It is possible she may have been a consenting party, and not influenced by dread: that is a question for you. She says the same thing had been done upon previous occasions, and her father had told her he would throttle her if she told her mother, and that is why she did not tell. She says she begged him not to do it, and to be quiet and leave her alone. This, in ordinary case would be quite insufficient; but in this case, if you think she remained passive under the influence of that dread and reign of terror which I have mentioned, and that is clearly made out, you may find the prisoner guilty' (v).

Submission to an act of carnal intercourse by a quack doctor on the faith of his statement that he was performing a surgical operation was held not to amount to consent, and he was convicted of rape (w).

A girl of sixteen was taken by her parents to the defendant, a German quack, on account of fits, by which she was afflicted; he said he would cure her, and bid her come again the next morning; she went accordingly the next morning by herself, and he told her she must strip naked; she said she would not. He said she must, or he could not do her any good. She began to untie her dress, and he stripped off all her clothes; she did nothing; he pulled off everything; she told him she did not like to be stripped in that manner. When she was naked he rubbed her with a liquid. The case was left to the jury to consider whether the defendant believed that stripping the girl would assist his judgment, or whether he did not strip her wantonly, without thinking it necessary; and they were told that the making her strip and pulling her clothes off might, under the latter circumstances, justify a verdict for an assault. The jury found the defendant guilty; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right (x). And it has been held that where a girl of fourteen submitted without resistance to carnal intercourse with a medical man who made her believe that he was treating her medically, he was guilty of assault (y).

Upon an indictment containing a count for an assault with intent to commit a rape, and a count for a common assault, it appeared that the defendant, a surgeon, attended the prosecutrix for bleeding piles, and had been with her to consult another surgeon, and afterwards went with her into her bedroom, and told her he was ordered to give her an injection, and directed her to put her head on the bed and her feet on the floor, which she did, and her clothes were up over her back. He then began to use the injection, and the water ran down her legs. She was going to raise herself up, and he said, 'Put your head on the bed and do not stir for a moment.' She had had injections before, and they keep persons still for a little while after they are applied. As she lay she perceived something very warm against her person; she resisted, and rose up from the bed, and said, 'Doctor, what do you mean?' His small clothes were quite open. She felt the parts of the prisoner enter hers just a little. Coleridge, J.: 'An assault with intent to commit a rape is very different from an assault with intent to have improper connection. The former is with intent to have connection by force; but here, according to the statement of the prosecutrix, the prisoner desists the moment she resists, and at most it could only be an attempt by surprise to get possession of the person of the prosecutrix, and that is not an assault with intent to commit a rape, but is an assault. If in this case the prisoner had intended to have effected his purpose by force, the complete offence of the rape would have been proved, as the prosecutrix states that the prisoner penetrated her person, and the smallest penetration is sufficient to complete the offence of rape' (z).

Upon an indictment for assault it appeared that the prisoner was a medical man, and that the girl alleged to have been assaulted was fourteen years old, and had been placed under his professional care in consequence of illness arising from suppressed menstruation. The defendant gave her medicines, and on her going to his house, and informing him that she was no better, he observed, 'Then I must try further means with you.' He then laid her down in the surgery, lifted up her clothes, and had connection with her, she making no resistance, believing, as she stated, that she was liberties, but alleged that the connection was against her will. The accused admitted the attempt but said that the woman then resisted and that he desisted. The summing up of Channell, B., accorded with that in R. v. Stanton.

submitting to medical treatment for the ailment under which she laboured. The jury were directed that the girl was of an age to consent to a man having connection with her, and that if they thought she consented to such connection with the defendant, he ought to be acquitted; but if they were satisfied she was ignorant of the nature of the defendant's act, and made no resistance solely from a bona-fide belief that the defendant was (as he represented) treating her medically with a view to her cure, his conduct amounted in point of law to an assault. The jury convicted, and, upon a case reserved upon the question whether this direction to the jury was correct in point of law, after argument, Wilde, C.J., thus delivered judgment: 'This case is free from doubt. The finding of the jury is clear. They are told that if they think she consented to the connection, they must acquit; that the girl was competent to consent; and that it is a question for them whether she did so or no. This is said to be qualified by what follows, viz., that if they thought she made no resistance, solely from the belief that the prisoner was treating her medically, they should convict of an assault. I do not see that this is any qualification; it is a strictly correct direction. The girl is fourteen years old. She might at that age be ignorant of the nature of the act, morally as well as physically, and of its possible consequences. It is said that, as she made no resistance, she must be viewed as a consenting party. That is a fallacy. Children who go to a dentist make no resistance; but they are not consenting parties. The prisoner disarmed her by fraud. She acquiesced under a misrepresentation that what he was doing was with a view to a cure, and that only; whereas it was done solely to gratify the passion of the prisoner. How does this differ from a case of total deception? She consented to one thing; he did another materially different, on which she had been prevented by his fraud from exercising her judgment and will. The cases (a) which have been referred to shew that where consent is caused by fraud, the act is at least an assault, and perhaps amounts to rape. It has been suggested that were the act to be regarded in the light of medical treatment, it would be no offence, and that it was not left to the jury whether the prisoner did not intend it as such. That certainly was not left to them, nor need have been. The notion that a medical man might lawfully adopt such a mode of treatment is not to be tolerated in a court of justice. He would have committed a high ecclesiastical offence at all events' (b).

Indictment.—As the absence of previous consent is a material ingredient in the offence of rape, it should be averred in the indictment by the words 'violently and against her will' or 'without her consent' (c). It is essential to aver, that the offender 'feloniously did ravish' the party; and the omission of the word 'ravished' will not be supplied by an averment that the offender 'did carnally know,' &c. (d). It has been considered that the words 'did carnally know' are not essential, on the ground that rapere signifies legally as much as carnaliter cognoscere (e); but they are appropriate to describe the nature of the crime, and appear to be generally used (f), and this omission would not be prudent (g). Six judges out of twelve thought that omission in an indictment of the words 'carnaliter cognovit' was cured by verdict, because those words were not in 9 Geo. IV. c. 31; but they thought it bad before verdict (h). Where an indictment alleged that the prisoner in and upon E. F., 'violently and feloniously did make (omitting "an assault"), and her the said E. F., then and there and against her will, violently and feloniously did ravish and carnally know'; upon a case reserved, ten of the judges were of opinion that the judgment ought not to be arrested, because of the omission of the words 'an assault' (i).

The indictment against aiders and abettors may lay the fact to have been done by all, or may charge it as having been done by one and abetted by the rest. Thus where, upon an appeal against several persons for ravishing the appellant's wife, an objection was taken that only one should have been charged as ravishing, and the others as accessories; or that there should have been several appeals, as the ravishing of one would not be the ravishing of the others: it was answered that if two come to ravish, and one by comport of the other does the act, both are principals, and the case proceeded (l). And where the indictment was against three persons for a rape, charging them all as principals in the first degree, that they ravished and carnally knew the woman; and the prisoners were all found guilty; the judge who tried them doubted whether the charge could be supported; and, at his desire, the case was mentioned by Heath, J., to the other judges, and all who were present agreed that the charge was valid, though the form was not to be recommended; but they gave no regular opinion, because the case was not regularly before them (m).

On an indictment of one for rape and another for aiding and abetting the rape, if the principal is (under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9) convicted of an attempt to commit rape the other defendant may be convicted of aiding and abetting the attempt (n).

An indictment in the first count charged F. with committing a rape, and L. with being present, aiding and assisting; the second count charged L. as principal in the first degree, and F. as aiding and assisting; the third count charged an evil-disposed person, to the jurors unknown, as principal in the first degree, and F. and L. as aiding and assisting; and the fourth count charged a certain other evil-disposed person as principal, and F. and L. as aiders. For the defence, before pleading it was moved to quash the indictment on the ground that it was bad for misjoinder of two offences of a different nature, and not liable to the same punishment, and that for aiding and abetting no provision was made by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31. It was also contended that the indictment contained different transactions and that the prosecutrix was bound to make an election. The Court overruled both objections. L. was acquitted, and a general verdict of guilty was found against F. It appeared that the prisoner, together with three other men, committed at the same time and place, the one after the other, successive rapes upon the body of the prosecutrix, the others aiding and abetting in turn; and the evidence, if believed, was sufficient to sustain the first count, as far as it charged F. as principal, as the other counts which charged him as aiding and assisting; and, upon a case reserved, the judges held that the conviction was good on the first count (o). Where the first count charged G. as principal in the first degree, and W. as present, aiding and assisting: and the second count charged W. as principal in the first degree, and G. as present, aiding and assisting; it was moved to quash the indictment, on the ground of misjoinder, as the judgment might be different, and it was said that this objection did not ultimately become material in the preceding case, as one prisoner alone was convicted; but Coleridge, J., said: 'The 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 16, awards the punishment of death to "every person convicted of the crime of rape." Now, I take it that a principal in the second degree falls clearly within that provision: and that, therefore, the objection that the judgment might be different entirely fails' (p). A woman who has aided a man in the commission of a rape may be indicted as a principal (q).

Evidence.—The unsworn evidence of young children is not admissible on an indictment for rape (r), but is admissible on an indictment for unlawfully and carnally knowing, or attempting to have unlawful carnal knowledge of, a girl under thirteen (s).

The woman ravished is a competent witness: and indeed is so much considered as a witness of necessity, that where a husband was charged

'There is an inaccuracy in the statement of this case; it treats the charge against the principal in the first degree as one count, and the charge against the principal in the second degree as another count; but that is not so, as both charges only constitute one count, as is plain from the indictments in murder, in which the conclusion, "and so the jurors, &c., say, that A., B., and C. murdered," always follows the allegation that B. and C. were present, aiding and assisting.' where on an indictment for abusing a child under ten years of age, the child was wholly ignorant of the nature of an oath, and therefore not examined, and it was proposed to give evidence of a statement made by her relative to the offence, and the name of the person who committed it; Pollock, C.B., refused to admit it, observing, 'If a man says to his surgeon, "I have a pain in my head," or a pain in such a part of the body, that is evidence; but if he says to his surgeon, "I have a wound," and adds, "I met John Thomas, who had a sword, and ran me through the body with it," that would be no evidence against John Thomas: and it is certainly a very odd reason for receiving the evidence of what a child has said, that that child is not capable of taking an oath.' with having assisted another man in ravishing his own wife, the wife was admitted as a witness against her husband (t).

But though the party ravished is a competent witness, the credibility of her testimony must be left to the jury, upon the circumstances of fact which concur with that testimony. Thus, if she is of good fame; if she presently discovered the offence, and made search for the offender; if she shewed circumstances and signs of the injury, whereof many are of that nature that women only are proper examiners; if the place where the fact was done were remote from inhabitants or passengers; if the party accused fled for it; these, and the like, are concurring circumstances which give greater probability to her evidence (u). But if, on the other hand, the witness is of evil fame, and stands unsupported by others; if, without being under control, or the influence of fear, she concealed the injury for any considerable time after she had the opportunity of complaining; if the place where the fact is alleged to have been committed was near to persons by whom she might probably have been heard, and yet she made no outcry; if she has given wrong descriptions of the place; these and the like circumstances, afford a strong, though not conclusive, presumption that her testimony is feigned (v).

The offence of rape is not triable at quarter sessions (w).

On an indictment for rape, the jury, if not satisfied that the complete offence has been committed, may convict of an attempt to commit rape (x). And by sect. 9 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), 'If upon the trial of an indictment for rape or any offence made a felony by sect. 4 of this Act the jury shall be satisfied that the defendant is guilty of an offence under sects. 3, 4, or 5 (vide post, pp. 951-956) of this Act (y) or of an indecent assault but are not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the felony charged in such indictment or of an attempt to commit the same, then, and in every such case the jury may acquit the defendant of such felony and find him guilty of such offence as aforesaid or of an indecent assault: and thereupon such defendant shall be liable to be punished in the same manner as if he had been convicted upon an indictment for such offence as aforesaid or for the misdemeanor of an indecent assault' (z).

other punishments lawful under that section. Use of stupefying or overpowering drugs with intent to commit an indictable offence is punishable under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 22 (c).

Where there is no reason to expect that the facts and circumstances will suffice in evidence to prove commission of the complete offence, the proper course is to indict for the common-law misdemeanor of an attempt to commit rape (d), or for the misdemeanor of assault with intent to ravish, which is, under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 38 (ante, p. 893), punishable as an assault with intent to commit felony, by imprisonment with or without hard labour for not more than two years (e). Courts of Quarter Sessions have jurisdiction to try this offence. Aiding and abetting an attempt to ravish is punishable under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 8, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 67 (ante, pp. 138, 139).

As to indecent assaults on females, vide post, p. 955.

Upon an indictment for an assault with intent to commit a rape, Patteson, J., in summing up, said: 'In order to find the prisoner guilty of an assault with intent to commit a rape, you must be satisfied that the prisoner, when he laid hold of the prosecutrix, not only desired to gratify his passions upon her person, but that he intended to do so at all events, and notwithstanding any resistance on her part (f). He also ruled that evidence that the prisoner, on a prior occasion, had taken liberties with the prosecutrix was not admissible to shew the prisoner's intent (g).

Under a count for an assault with intent to commit rape, a prisoner may be convicted of common assault (h). But on an indictment containing a count for an assault with intent to commit a rape, and a count for a common assault, if the prisoner be acquitted on the count for an assault with intent to commit a rape, on the ground that the prosecutrix consented, he cannot be convicted on the count for a common assault; for to support that count such an assault must be proved as could not be justified if an action were brought for it, and leave and licence pleaded (i).

An indictment may contain two counts for two different attempts to commit a rape on the same female, and evidence of both may be given on the trial (j). And where one count charged the prisoner with an attempt to commit a rape, and another count charged him with an assault and the record stated that the jury found him 'guilty of the misdemeanor and offence in the said indictment specified,' and it was adjudged that 'for the said misdemeanor,' he shall be imprisoned for two years and kept to hard labour; it was held, upon error, that the word 'misdemeanor' was nomen collectivum, and therefore the finding of the jury was in effect that the prisoner was guilty of the whole matter charged by the indictment, and consequently the judgment was warranted by the verdict (k).

complaint was made by the prosecutrix shortly after the time when the offence is alleged to have been committed and the particulars of the complaint may, so far as they relate to the charge against the prisoner, be given in evidence for the prosecutrix, not as evidence of the facts complained of nor as part of the res gestæ, but to shew the consistency of the conduct of the prosecutrix with the evidence given by her at the trial and as negating consent on her part (l).

R. v. Clarke (m), cited in former editions of this work (n) as authority for the proposition that the particulars of the complaint cannot be given in evidence is said by Hawkins, J., in R. v. Lillyman (l) not to contain any such ruling, but to decide only (1) that the fact of the woman having made the complaint is admissible, (2) that the fact and the particulars of the complaint are not evidence of the truth of the complaint or of the statements of fact on which it was based; and these rulings he adopted as settled law (o).

The cases of R. v. Walker (p), R. v. Osborne (q) so far as they are inconsistent with R. v. Lillyman are overruled. R. v. Wood (r) is in accord with R. v. Lillyman (s), and so is R. v. Eyre (t) except as to the ruling by Byles, J., that what was said to the woman in answer to what she said immediately after the occasion was equally evidence with her complaint (u), which is open to question.

The ruling in R. v. Lillyman makes it unnecessary to resort to the modes of getting in the particulars of the complaint by indirect methods countenanced in R. v. Wink (v), but disapproved in R. v. Osborne (ubi sup.) and R. v. Taylor (w) and in R. v. Lillyman (x).

The rule as to the admissibility of fresh complaint applies not only to rape but also to attempts to have carnal knowledge of a girl of thirteen and under sixteen (y), assaults with intent to ravish, and indecent assaults,

In that case, Cresswell, J., ruled that what the prosecutrix said at the time when the offence was committed was admissible (as part of the res gestæ), because the prisoner was present and the violence going on; (2) that if the prisoner had gone away, and the prosecutrix had in running away shouted out the name of the prisoner, they would not be admissible. whether the female assaulted is (z) or is not (a) of an age to consent to an indecent assault.

The question arose whether the rule in R. v. Lillyman was limited to cases of offences against females, where the absence of consent was an essential element in law of the offence. Upon this fact there were inconsistent rulings (b), but in R. v. Osborne (c) it was decided that the complaint in the case of offences against female chastity (d) is admissible, not merely as negating consent but establishing the consistency of the story told by the prosecutrix at the trial, which, from the nature of the case, is aided by proof of immediate complaint and discredited by failure to make it, and that whether consent in the particular case is legally a necessary part of the issue or is a collateral issue of fact or merely part of the story of the prosecutrix, in either case it is equally admissible (e).

The rules now established are clearly exceptional, but are traced historically to the old common-law rule applicable in appeals of rape, that it was for the prosecution to shew whether, while the offence was recent, the woman raised the hue and cry and shewed her injuries and clothing to others (f).

The rule is obviously one to be kept carefully within due limits. 'It applies only where there is a complaint, not elicited by questions of a leading and inducing or intimidating character (g), and only when it is made at the first opportunity after the offence which reasonably offers itself within such bounds . . . the evidence should be put before the jury, the judge being careful to inform the jury that the statement is not evidence of the facts complained of and must not be regarded by them, if believed, as other than corroborative of the complainant's credibility, and when consent is an issue of the absence of consent' (h).

The following rulings have been given as to the time within which the complaint must be made for it to be admissible. Three weeks after the alleged offence, indecent assault, has been held too late (i) and a complaint was held too late when made on the Monday following the day of the alleged offence, Saturday (j). It need not be made on the earliest possible opportunity, but on the first opportunity which reasonably offers (k).

The question whether the complaint was made reasonably soon appears to be for the judge and not for the jury (l).

In R. v. Megson (m) a woman who had undoubtedly been ravished by some man had died before the trial without having made any admissible deposition which could be placed before the jury. An attempt was made to put in evidence a detailed account of the transaction in the shape of a complaint by the woman with a view by that complaint alone to shew the prisoner to be the guilty person. Rolfe, B., rejected the evidence, saying: 'There is a wide difference between receiving such statements as confirmation of a prosecutrix's credibility in a charge of rape in which she is examined as a witness and a case like the present, where the complaint made is to be received as independent evidence.'

In R. v. Guttridge (n), where the prosecutrix, though living, was not examined as a witness, Parke, B., held that it was not competent to prove that she made a complaint soon after the occurrence; for such evidence would be merely confirmatory of the story of the prosecutrix, and no part of the res gestæ (nn).

The character of the prosecutrix, as to general chastity, may be impeached by general evidence (o), as by shewing her general light character, and giving general evidence of her being a street walker (p). And the prosecutrix may be cross-examined as to particular discreditable transactions (q) and as to her having had connection with the prisoner previously to the alleged rape (r), and if she deny such connection, the prisoner may shew that she has been previously connected with him (s). On an indictment for an indecent assault, as in cases of rape, or attempt to commit rape, the answer of the prosecutrix, to questions put to her on cross-examination as to particular acts of connection with persons named to her, other than the prisoner, is final, and the party questioning is bound thereby, and if her answer be a denial, the persons named cannot be called to contradict her (t).

Where, on a trial for rape, the prosecutrix was cross-examined as to a charge of stealing money from a former mistress, and as to the account she had given of the money found in her possession to a constable, and she said that she told the constable a gentleman had given it her for not telling of his insulting her, and denied that she had told him that it was given her by the gentleman for having connection with her ; it was held that the constable could not be called to contradict her, and to prove that she told him the gentleman had given her the money for having connection with her (u).

The application of these and other rules should always be made with due regard to the caution given by Hale, who says : ' It is true, that rape is a most detestable crime, and therefore ought severely and impartially to be punished with death ; but it must be remembered, that it is an accusation easily to be made and hard to be proved, and harder to be defended by the party accused, though never so innocent ' (v). He then mentions two remarkable cases of malicious prosecution for this crime, that had come within his own knowledge : and concludes, ' I mention these instances, that we may be the more cautious upon trials of offences of this nature, wherein the Court and jury may, with so much ease, be imposed upon without great care and vigilance : the heinousness of the offence many times transporting the judge and jury with so much indignation, that they are over-hastily carried to the conviction of the person accused thereof, by the confident testimony, sometimes, of malicious and false witnesses ' (w).

Where, on a trial for rape, the prosecutrix stated that she complained almost immediately to her mistress, and the next day her clothes were washed by a washerwoman, and they had blood on them ; Pollock, C.B., directed these persons to be called as witnesses for the prosecution, although they were attending as witnesses for the prisoner, but allowed the counsel for the prosecution all latitude in examining them (x).

On a trial for rape it was proposed on the part of the prisoner to ask a witness for the defence as to something that had been said by a relative of the prosecutrix to a relative of the prisoner, in the presence of the prosecutrix, about making it up ; it was objected that evidence of a conversation between third persons, not made in the presence of the prisoner, was inadmissible. Martin, B. : ' In a civil case, what is said in the presence of either of the parties is admissible, because it is open to the party so present to express assent or dissent to what is said, and that would be admissible against him. In criminal cases, the prosecutor, although not in strict law a party to the case, is so in fact ; and I think that the rule applicable to conversation in the presence of a party in a civil case may be fairly extended to a conversation in the presence of the prosecutor in a criminal case ' (y).

SECT. II.—UNLAWFUL CARNAL KNOWLEDGE OF IDIOT, IMBECILE, AND LUNATIC FEMALES.

Common Law.—On a trial for a rape upon an idiot girl, Willes, J., directed the jury, that if they were satisfied that the girl was in such a state of idiocy as to be incapable of expressing either consent or dissent, and that the prisoner had connection with her without her consent, it was their duty to find him guilty; but that a consent produced by mere animal instinct would be sufficient to prevent the act from constituting a rape (z).

In a subsequent case it was held that there must be some evidence of want of consent, even when the woman is an idiot, to warrant a conviction for rape (a). This decision must be taken as a ruling on the particular evidence: and in R. v. Barratt (b), the Court adopted the rule of law as laid down in the earlier case of R. v. Fletcher (c).

In R. v. Barratt, the prisoner was convicted of attempting to rape a girl of fourteen years of age who had been blind from six weeks old and wrong in her mind, hardly capable of understanding anything that was said to her, but capable of going up and down stairs by herself. If placed in a chair by anyone she would remain there till night, passing her evacuations in the chair. If told to lie down she would do so. She could not communicate to her friends what she wanted. She could feed herself a little, but was obliged to be dressed and undressed, and was unable to do any work. The prisoner had known her and her family for two years, and knew she was not right in her mind. There were no marks of violence, but there had been recent connection, and the surgeon thought she had been in the habit of having connection. The girl upon being brought into Court was evidently idiotic, and it was found impossible to communicate with her. She grinned, and made no reply to questions except a vacant laugh. The prisoner was seen by the girl's father lying on the girl, who was lying on a couch where she had been placed by her sister. When the father entered the room the prisoner was standing up buttoning his trousers, while the girl was lying quietly on the couch. Blackburn, J., said there was ample evidence of the want of capacity to give consent, and it was held that the act being done without consent the prisoner was rightly convicted.

Statutes.—By sect. 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), 'Any person who—

(2) Unlawfully and carnally knows or attempts to have unlawful carnal knowledge (d) of any female idiot or imbecile woman or girl under circumstances which do not amount to rape (d) but which prove that the offender knew at the time of the commission of the offence that the woman or girl was an idiot or imbecile, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour.'

SECT. III.—UNLAWFUL CARNAL KNOWLEDGE OF GIRLS UNDER SIXTEEN.

It is an essential element in the crime of rape that the carnal knowledge should be without the previous consent of the female. There has been much legislation to deal with corruption of young girls (j), which is cumulative on the law as to rape and indecent assault (k). That now in force is contained in the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69).

Girls under Thirteen.—By sect. 4 (l), 'Any person who unlawfully and carnally knows (m) any girl under the age of thirteen years shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . (n).

(f) i.e., an asylum, hospital, or licensed house (s. 341, ante, p. 925).

(g) See 47 & 48 Vict. c. 64.

(h) It is to be noted that the female is not described as a lunatic, but as under care or treatment; i.e., it is not the fact of lunacy, but the fact of being under treatment that takes away the power to consent and creates the liability of the person in charge.

(i) Prosecutions for the offence can be taken only as prescribed by s. 325, ante, p. 929.

(j) By 18 Eliz. c. 7, carnal knowledge of any woman-child under the age of ten years was made felony without benefit of clergy, without reference to the consent or non-consent of the child, which was therefore considered as immaterial. It appears at one time to have been thought that the carnal knowledge of a child above the age of ten and under twelve years was rape, though she consented: twelve years being the age of consent in a female, and the Statute Westm. 1, 13 Edw. I. c. 13, which enacted, 'That none do ravish any maiden within age, neither by her own consent nor without,' being admitted to refer, by the words, 'within age,' to the age of twelve years. (1 Hale, 631, 2 Co. Inst. 180, 3 Co. Inst. 60.) It was, however, afterwards well established that if the child was above ten years old it was not a rape, unless it was without her consent. Sum. 112, 4 Bl. Com. 212, 1 East, P. C. 436. But children above that age, and under twelve, were within the protection of the Statute of Westm. 1, c. 13, the law with respect to the carnal knowledge of such children not having been altered by either of the subsequent Statutes of Westm. 2, Edw. I. c. 34, or 18 Eliz. c. 7. The Statute Westm. 1, c. 13, made the deflowering a child above ten years old, and under twelve, though with her own consent, a misdemeanor punishable by two years' imprisonment, and fine at the King's pleasure (4 Bl. Com. 212, 1 East, P. C. 436). These statutes were repealed by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31 (E), and 10 Geo. IV. c. 34 (I). Those Acts in turn were repealed in 1861, and such offences against girls under ten were made punishable by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 50, 51, which were repealed in 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 94) making the age twelve. The Act of 1875 was repealed in 1885 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 69).

(k) See 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, s. 16, and ante, p. 6.

(l) This clause replaced 38 & 39 Vict. c. 94, s. 3, raising the age from twelve to thirteen.

(m) Proof of penetration is sufficient, and it is not necessary to prove emission. R. v. Marsden [1891], 2 Q.B. 149. Vide ante, p. 933.

(n) Now three years, 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, p. 211, or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not more than two years, ante, p. 212. The words omitted are repealed.

'Any person who attempts to have unlawful carnal knowledge of any girl under the age of thirteen years shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour (o).

'Provided that in the case of an offender whose age does not exceed sixteen years, the Court may, instead of sentencing him to any term of imprisonment, order him to be whipped, as prescribed by the Whipping Act, 1862 (p), and the said Act shall apply so far as circumstances admit as if the offender had been convicted in manner in that Act mentioned; . . . ' (pp).

Unsworn Evidence.—['Where upon the hearing of a charge under this section, the girl in respect of whom the offence is charged to have been committed, or any other child of tender years who is tendered as a witness, does not, in the opinion of the Court or justices, understand the nature of an oath, the evidence of such girl or other child of tender years may be received, though not given upon oath, if, in the opinion of the Court or justices, as the case may be, such girl or other child of tender years is possessed of sufficient intelligence to justify the reception of the evidence, and understands the duty of speaking the truth (g).

Corroboration.—'Provided that no person shall be liable to be convicted of the offence unless the testimony admitted by virtue of this section and given on behalf of the prosecution shall be corroborated by some other material evidence in support thereof implicating the accused (r): Provided also, that any witness whose evidence has been admitted under this section shall be liable to indictment and punishment for perjury in all respects as if he or she had been sworn'] (rr).

On an indictment for felony under this section the defendant may be convicted of an indecent assault (s), to which the consent of a girl under thirteen is no defence (t), but not of a common assault (u). On an indictment for the attempt, a verdict of indecent assault or, unless there were consent, of common assault, would seem to be possible.

The consent of a child under thirteen is immaterial both as to the complete offence (v) and the attempt (w). But this enactment does not exclude liability to prosecution for rape if the child did not in fact consent (x) nor is proof of want of consent a ground for acquittal (y).

A boy under fourteen cannot be convicted of the complete offence under 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, s. 4 (yy), but on an indictment under that section he may be convicted of an indecent assault (z). The consent of a girl under thirteen is no defence to proceedings under sect. 4.

Under the repealed enactments as to abusing children of tender years it was considered, 'that although a child between ten and twelve cannot by law consent to have connection, so as to make that connection no offence, yet, where the essence of the offence charged is an assault (and there can be in law no assault, unless it be against consent) (a), this attempt, though a criminal offence, is not an assault; and the indictment must be for an attempt to commit a felony, if the child is under ten years old, and for an attempt to commit a misdemeanor, if the child is between the ages of ten and twelve; for it is perfectly clear that every attempt (not every intention, but every attempt) to commit a misdemeanor is a misdemeanor' (b).

On this view on failure to prove commission of the full offence against a girl above ten and under twelve it was held that the defendant could not be convicted on other counts of the indictment charging (1) assault with intent carnally to know; (2) common assault. The judges considered that as consent in fact had been proved there could not be a conviction of assault and that the proper charge was attempt to commit the statutory offence (c). In a later case, R. v. Guthrie (d), on an indictment under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 60, s. 51, containing a single count for the misdemeanor of carnally knowing a girl between ten and twelve years of age, the principal offence was not proved, but there was evidence of indecent assault. The jury returned a verdict of common assault, which was held good, the Court considering that the indictment charged an assault as a distinct, separable offence. In R. v. Catherall (e) it was held that the

A child under ten years of age cannot give consent to any criminal intercourse, so as to deprive that intercourse of criminality; but she can give such consent as to render the attempt no assault. We know that a child can consent to that which, without such consent, would constitute an assault.' And he refused to allow a conviction of assault on an indictment for criminally knowing a child under ten, too young to be sworn as a witness. There was no evidence of consent or non-consent except medical proof of marks of violence, which might have been inflicted by any foreign substance.

jury could not convict of common assault on an indictment charging the felony, under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 93, s. 4 (rep.), of carnally knowing a girl under twelve.

Upon an indictment for attempting to abuse (f) a child under the age of ten, containing a count for a common assault, no proof was given of the child being under ten years of age but it appeared that the prisoner made an attempt on her, without any violence on his part, or actual resistance on hers, and it was contended that as she offered no resistance it must be taken that she consented, and therefore the prisoner must be acquitted. Coleridge, J.: 'There is a difference between consent and submission; every consent involves a submission; but it by no means follows that a mere submission involves consent. It would be too much to say, that an adult submitting quietly to an outrage of this description, was not consenting; on the other hand, the mere submission of a child, when in the power of a strong man, and most probably acted upon by fear, can by no means be taken to be such a consent, as will justify the prisoner in point of law. You will therefore say whether the submission of the prosecutrix was voluntary on her part, or the result of fear under the circumstances in which she was placed. If you are of the latter opinion, you will find the prisoner guilty on the second count of the indictment' (g).

Carnal Knowledge of Girls of Thirteen and under Sixteen.—By sect. 5, 'Any person who (1) Unlawfully and carnally knows or attempts to have unlawful carnal knowledge of any girl being of or above the age of thirteen years and under the age of sixteen years; . . . (h) shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.

'Provided that it shall be a sufficient defence to any charge under sub-section one of this section if it shall be made to appear to the Court or jury before whom the charge shall be brought that the person so charged had reasonable cause to believe that the girl was of or above the age of sixteen years (i).

'Provided also, that no prosecution shall be commenced for an offence under sub-section one of this section more than six (k) months after the commission of the offence' (l).

Permitting Defilement of Girls under Sixteen.—By sect. 6, 'Any person who, being the owner or occupier of any premises, or having, or acting or assisting in, the management or control thereof, induces or knowingly suffers any girl of such age as is in this section mentioned to resort to or be in or upon such premises for the purpose of being unlawfully and carnally known by any man, whether such carnal knowledge is intended to be with any particular man or generally (m),

‘(1) shall, if such girl is under the age of thirteen years, be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude for life, . . . (n); and

‘Provided that it shall be a sufficient defence to any charge under this section if it shall be made to appear to the Court or jury before whom the charge shall be brought that the person so charged had reasonable cause to believe that the girl was of or above the age of sixteen years.’

On an indictment containing (1) a count for an offence under sect. 5, (2) a count for an indecent assault, the defendant may be convicted of common assault (o). But it would seem that on an indictment under sect. 5, there cannot be a conviction of indecent assault and common assault if the girl consented to what was done, as 43 & 44 Vict. c. 45 does not apply to a girl of thirteen or over.

A girl of thirteen or under sixteen cannot be convicted of aiding and abetting the commission with herself of an offence against sect. 5 (p).

Liability to punishment under sect. 5 does not exempt from liability to prosecution and punishment for rape if the girl did not consent: but a person may not be twice punished in respect of the same transaction (q), or on an indictment under sect. 5, even if the facts proved constituted a rape. It would seem that the accused might be convicted of the misdemeanor under sect. 5, by virtue of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 12 (r).

Allowing Child or Young Person to be in Brothels.—By the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. (tt) The accused may elect to be tried on indictment, vide ante, p. 17.

(ante, p. 951), but upon the trial of a person under that section it shall be lawful for the jury, if they are satisfied that the accused is guilty of an offence under this section, to find the accused guilty of such offence.'

By sect. 17, '(1) If any person having the custody, charge, or care of a girl under the age of sixteen years causes or encourages the seduction or prostitution of that girl, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years.

'(2) For the purposes of this section a person shall be deemed to have caused or encouraged the seduction or prostitution (as the case may be) of the girl who has been seduced or become a prostitute if he has knowingly allowed the girl to consort with or to enter or to continue in the employment of, any prostitute or person of known immoral character.'

The procedure and evidence on trials for offences under ss. 16, 17 (supra) is regulated by Part II. of the Children Act, 1908, ss. 27-38 (vide p. 918 et seq.).

By sect. 18, '(1) Where it is shewn to the satisfaction of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction that a girl under the age of sixteen years is, with the knowledge of her parent or guardian exposed to the risk of seduction or prostitution, or living a life of prostitution, the Court may adjudge her parent or guardian to enter into a recognisance to exercise due care and supervision with respect of the girl.

'(2) The provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, with respect to recognisances to be of good behaviour, (including the provisions as to the enforcement thereof,) shall apply to recognisances under this section.'

Girls under Eighteen.—As to abduction of girls under eighteen with intent that they shall be carnally known, see 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, s. 7, post, p. 967.

By the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), sect. 12, 'Where on the trial of any offence under this Act it is proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the seduction or prostitution of a girl under the age of sixteen has been caused, encouraged, or favoured by her father, mother, guardian, master, or mistress, it shall be in the power of the Court to divest such father, mother, guardian, master, or mistress of all authority over her, and to appoint any person or persons willing to take charge of such girl to be her guardian until she has attained the age of twenty-one, or any age below this as the Court may direct, and the High Court shall have the power from time to time to rescind or vary such order by the appointment of any other person or persons as such guardian, or in any other respect.'

This provision is supplemented by the provisions of the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67, s. 26, ante, p. 918).

Indictment.—In indictments for offences against girls under sixteen care should be taken to specify the age of the girl, in accordance with the terms of the section on which the charge is founded, i.e. 'under the age of thirteen years' or 'of the age of thirteen years and under the age of sixteen years,' for the description appears to be matter of substance, and to amend the age might be to insert in the indictment an offence distinct from that originally charged (u).

Proof of Age.—The provisions of the Children Act, 1908, as to presumption of the age of children (v) do not apply to offences under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885. It is therefore necessary in prosecutions under sects. 4, 5 with respect to girls, to prove that the girl against whom the offence is alleged to have been committed should be proved by the prosecution to be under thirteen or under sixteen as the case requires. The evidence of age should be clear and distinct. It is usually given by producing a certified copy of the entry in the register of births kept under the Births and Deaths Registration Act (w), coupled with evidence of the identity of the girl with the child referred to in the entry. The certificate is evidence of the date as well as the fact and registration of the birth (x). It is immaterial whether the certified copy emanates from the registry at Somerset House or from the district registry or the office of the superintendent registrar of the district (w). But production of the certificate is not essential, and the age may be proved by any person who has sufficient knowledge of the facts (y).

Where the offence of carnally knowing a child under ten years of age was charged to have been committed on February 5, 1832, and the only evidence of the age of the child was given by the father, who stated that in February, 1822, he went from home for a few days, and that his wife had not then been confined, and that on his return on February 9, he found the child had been born, and he was told by his wife's mother that it had been born the day before; the grandmother was alive at the time of the trial, but the mother was dead. It was held that the evidence was not sufficient, and that the grandmother ought to have been called, for in a matter of so much importance the best evidence ought to be adduced (z). On a similar indictment, evidence by the child herself that she was ten years old on a particular day, her mother being ill at home, and her father being unable to state the precise time of her birth, was held insufficient (a). But on an indictment for carnally knowing a child under ten years of age the mother stated that she had never kept any account of the child's age, but that her knowledge of it was derived from hearing her husband speak of it, and from conversation with him and the child, and that it had been usual to keep the birthday of the child on February 7, and there was no other evidence of the age: it was objected that more certain evidence of the age ought to have been produced, and R. v. Wedge (supra) was relied upon; Coltman, J., however, observed, that 'the evidence in that case was mere hearsay; but this evidence went much farther, and must be submitted to the jury as some evidence, though open to observation, as to the child's age (b).

Where the mother of a child swore that she was ten years old last March, but did not know the year and month of the child's birth, and in cross-examination gave confused and inconsistent answers as to the age of her children, it was held that there was some evidence for the jury as to the age of the child (c).

As to taking the evidence of the person charged and of the husband and wife of the person charged, see 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, s. 20 (d), 61 & 62 Vict. c. 36, ss. 1, 4, and 8 Edw. VII. c. 67, s. 27, and post, Book XIII. Chapter V. 'Evidence.'

SECT. IV.—INDECENT ASSAULT ON FEMALES.

Indecent Assault.—By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 52, 'Whosoever shall be convicted of an indecent assault upon any female . . . (e) shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years with or without hard labour.'

As to conviction of indecent assault on an indictment for rape or felonious carnal knowledge of a girl under thirteen, see ante, p. 941 (f).

By the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67), s. 127 (2), Courts of Summary Jurisdiction are empowered to try adults for indecent assault on a female who in the opinion of the Court is under sixteen, if the defendant consents, vide 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 12. The maximum punishment on summary conviction for the offence is six months' imprisonment.

By 43 & 44 Vict. c. 45, 'It shall be no defence to a charge or indictment for an indecent assault on a young person (g) under the age of thirteen to prove that he or she consented to the act of indecency (h). In cases of indecent assault on females of thirteen or over the defence of consent is still available. The section applies to England and Ireland. (See sect. 3.)

SECT. V.—PROCURING THE DEFILEMENT OR PROSTITUTION OF WOMEN AND GIRLS.

Procuration.—By the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), sect. 2, 'Any person who, (1) Procures or attempts to procure any girl or woman under twenty-one years of age, not being a common prostitute, or of known immoral character, to have unlawful carnal connection, either within or without the King's dominions, with any other person or persons; or (2) Procures or attempts to procure any woman or girl to become, either within or without the King's dominions, a common prostitute; or (3) Procures or attempts to procure any woman

(d) This section was in R. v. Owen, 20 Q.B.D. 829, held to render a person charged with indecent assault competent as a witness in his own behalf.

(e) The words omitted relating to attempts to have carnal knowledge of girls under twelve were repealed in 1885, 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, s. 19. On proceedings under s. 52, for indecent assault on a female under sixteen, the unsworn evidence of a child is admissible, 8 Edw. VII. c. 67, s. 30 (ante, p. 919), which overrides R. v.

Paul, 25 Q.B.D. 202.

(f) A boy under fourteen who is indicted under 48 & 49 Vict. c. 69, s. 4 (ante, p. 950) for carnally knowing a girl under thirteen may on that indictment be convicted of indecent assault. R. v. Williams [1893], 1 Q.B. 320.

or girl to leave the United Kingdom, with intent that she may become an inmate of a brothel elsewhere; or (4) Procures or attempts to procure any woman or girl to leave her usual place of abode in the United Kingdom (such place not being a brothel), with intent that she may, for the purposes of prostitution, become an inmate of a brothel within or without the King's dominions, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour' (i).

Corroboration.—'Provided that no person shall be convicted of any offence under this section upon the evidence of one witness, unless such witness be corroborated in some material particular by evidence implicating the accused.' (Vide post, Book XIII. Chapter V.)

Defilement by Threats, Fraud, or Drugs.—By sect. 3, 'Any person who, (1) By threats or intimidation procures or attempts to procure any woman or girl to have any unlawful carnal connection, either within or without the King's dominions; or (2) By false pretences or false representations procures any woman or girl, not being a common prostitute (j) or of known immoral character, to have any unlawful carnal connection, either within or without the King's dominions; or (3) Applies, administers to, or causes to be taken by any woman or girl any drug, matter, or thing, with intent to stupefy or overpower so as thereby to enable any person to have unlawful carnal connection with such woman or girl, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour' (k).

Corroboration.—'Provided that no person shall be convicted of an offence under this section upon the evidence of one witness only, unless such witness be corroborated in some material particular by evidence implicating the accused.' (See post, Book XIII. Chapter V.)

Detention in Brothels.—By sect. 8, 'Any person who detains any woman or girl against her will, (1) In or upon any premises with intent that she may be unlawfully and carnally known by any man, whether any particular man or generally (l); or (2) In any brothel, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.

'Where a woman or girl is in or upon any premises for the purpose of having any unlawful carnal connection, or is in any brothel, a person shall be deemed to detain such woman or girl in or upon such premises or in such brothel, if, with intent to compel or induce her to remain in or upon such premises or in such brothel, such person withholds from such woman or girl any wearing apparel or other property belonging to her, or, where wearing apparel has been lent or otherwise supplied to such woman or girl by or by the direction of such person, such person threatens such woman or girl with legal proceedings if she takes away with her the wearing apparel so lent or supplied.

‘No legal proceedings, whether civil or criminal, shall be taken against any such woman or girl for taking away or being found in possession of any such wearing apparel as was necessary to enable her to leave such premises or brothel.’

Search Warrant.—By sect. 10, ‘If it appears to any justice of the peace, on information made before him on oath by any parent, relative, or guardian of any woman or girl, or any other person who, in the opinion of the justice is bona fide acting in the interest of any woman or girl, that there is reasonable cause to suspect that such woman or girl is unlawfully detained for immoral purposes by any person in any place within the jurisdiction of such justice, such justice may issue a warrant (m) authorising any person named therein to search for, and when found, to take to and detain in a place of safety such woman or girl until she can be brought before a justice of the peace; and the justice of the peace before whom such woman or girl is brought may cause her to be delivered up to her parents or guardians, or otherwise dealt with as circumstances may permit and require.

‘The justice of the peace issuing such warrant may, by the same or any other warrant (n), cause any person accused of so unlawfully detaining such woman or girl to be apprehended and brought before a justice, and proceedings to be taken for punishing such person according to law.

‘A woman or girl shall be deemed to be unlawfully detained for immoral purposes if she is so detained for the purpose of being unlawfully and carnally known by any man, whether any particular man or generally, and (a.) Either is under the age of sixteen years; or (b.) If of or over the age of sixteen years, and under the age of eighteen years, is so detained against her will, or against the will of her father or mother or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her; or (c.) If of or above the age of eighteen years is so detained against her will. Any person authorised by warrant under this section to search for any woman or girl so detained as aforesaid may enter (if need be by force) any house, building or other place specified in such warrant, and may remove such woman or girl therefrom.

‘Provided always, that every warrant issued under this section shall be addressed to and executed by some superintendent, inspector, or other officer of police, who shall be accompanied by the parent, relative, or guardian or other person making the information, if such person so desire, unless the justice shall otherwise direct.’

A conspiracy by false pretences to procure a female under the age of twenty-one years to have illicit carnal connection with a man has been held to be an indictable misdemeanor at common law (o).

counts were framed on 12 & 13 Vict. c. 76, which was repealed in 1891 (S. L. R.), but no opinion was expressed as to them. R. v. Delaval, 3 Burr. 1434, was referred to by the Court. Vide ante, p. 158, tit. ‘Conspiracy.’

CANADIAN NOTES.

OF RAPE, AND OF THE DEFILEMENT OR CORRUPTION OF FEMALES.

Sec. 1.—Of Rape, Definition of.—Code sec. 298.

Carnal Knowledge.—Code sec. 7.

Female Under Fourteen.—An indictment for rape lies against one who has ravished a female under the age of fourteen years against her will, notwithstanding the provisions of sec. 301, which enacts that everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life, and to be whipped, who carnally knows any girl under the age of fourteen years, not being his wife. R. v. Riopel (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 225.

Consent.—By Child Under Fourteen, not a Defence.—Code sec. 294.

Consent.—It has been held that, in the case of alleged rape on an idiot or lunatic the mere proof of connection will not warrant the case being left to the jury; that there must be some evidence that it was without her consent, e.g., that she was incapable, from imbecility, of expressing assent or dissent; and that if she consent from mere animal passion it is not rape. R. v. Connolly (1867), 26 U.C.Q.B. 317.

The question whether the act of connection was consummated through fear, or merely through solicitation is a question of fact for the jury. R. v. Day (1841), 9 C. & P. 722; R. v. Jones (1861), 4 L.T.N.S. 154; R. v. Cardo (1889), 17 Ont. R. 11.

Evidence of complaint made by the woman on a charge of rape as corroborative of non-consent will be rejected if made only in answer to questions suggesting the guilt of the accused. The King v. Dunning, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 461.

Proof on behalf of the defence that the injured party or her parents had instituted civil proceedings to recover damages arising from the commission of the alleged rape is properly excluded upon the criminal trial as irrelevant, unless other facts have been disclosed in evidence which tend to shew an intent to thereby wrongfully extort money from the accused. R. v. Riendeau (1900), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 293.

On a charge of rape evidence is admissible on behalf of the defence to contradict a statement of the complainant, made on her cross-examination, denying that, on an occasion when she met the accused subsequent to the alleged rape, she had refused to put an end to the interview, as requested by her mother, and had struck her mother for the latter's interference. Such evidence is relevant to the charge not only as affecting the credibility of the complainant's testimony generally, but as shewing conduct inconsistent with resistance to the alleged offence. R. v. Riendeau (No. 2), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 421 (Que.).

The prisoner's statement made at a previous trial through his counsel may be given in evidence by the prosecution if it tends to anticipate a possible defence which might be offered by the prisoner. R. v. Bedere (1891), 21 O.R. 189.

Questions may be put to the complainant tending to elicit the fact that she had previously had connection with other men. So where the prosecutrix, after she had declared she had not previously had connection with a man other than the prisoner, was asked in cross-examination whether she remembered having been in the milk house of G. with two men, D.M. and B.M., one after the other. Held, that the witness may object, or the Judge, may, in his discretion, tell the witness she is not bound to answer the question. R. v. Laliberté (1877), 1 Can. S.C.R. 117.

The weight of authority and the course of practice by the Judges in England is to permit questions of the kind to be asked of a witness on cross-examination in cases of rape. The prosecuting officer is not permitted to raise the objection. The witness may object, or the Judge may tell the witness she is not obliged to answer, if he thinks proper, though not bound to do so, and the Judge will decide whether the witness is obliged to answer or not, when the point is raised. R. v. Laliberté (1877), 1 Can. S.C.R. 117, 131, per Richards, C.J.

In the same case prisoner's counsel afterwards proposed to ask one of the witnesses for the defence: "Did you see the prosecutrix with D.M. and B.M.? if you have, please state on which occasion, and what were they doing?" This question was also disallowed by the Judge, and the objection was sustained in the Supreme Court of Canada on the authority of R. v. Cockroft (1870), 11 Cox Cr. Cas. 410, and R. v. Holmes (1871), L.R. 1 C.C.R. 234, upon the principle that a witness cannot be contradicted in matters foreign to the issue, which, on the trial of this indictment was, not whether the prosecutrix was unchaste, but whether the prisoner had had connection with her by violence. R. v. Laliberte (1877), 1 Can. S.C.R. 117, 142.

Evidence is admissible for the defence of the general bad reputation of the prosecutrix for unchastity. R. v. Bishop (1906), 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 30.

Where two prisoners are jointly indicted but an order is made for their separate trial, the one is an admissible witness for the other and is bound to testify although he may prevent his evidence being used against himself at his subsequent trial. Only the person then on trial is a "person charged" within the meaning of the Canada Evidence Act, sec. 4, and comment is not prohibited as to the failure of the accused to call as a witness the person jointly indicted with him but whose trial has been ordered to be separate. The King v. Blais, 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 354, 11 O.L.R. 345.

On a charge of aiding and abetting another to commit rape if it appears that a man called as a witness for the prosecution had immediately prior to the offence been in the company of the prosecutrix under circumstances making it probable that he had had illicit connection with her, and that the man accused of the rape had taken the prosecutrix away from the witness, the witness may be cross-examined as to his relations with the prosecutrix for the purpose of shewing prejudice against the accused, and for this purpose is bound to answer whether he had had connection with the prosecutrix on that occasion. And where the witness refused to answer as to his connection with the prosecutrix and the trial Judge upheld his refusal, and the prosecutrix also refused to answer as to same, but the guilt of the accused was corroborated by independent testimony, Code sec. 1019 may be applied to uphold the conviction on the ground that no substantial wrong has been occasioned by the ruling. The King v. Finnessey, 10 Can. Cr. Cas. 347.

Evidence of Fresh Complaint.—Upon the trial of a charge of rape the whole statement made by the woman by way of complaint shortly after the alleged offence; including the name of the party complained against and the other details of the complaint, is admissible in evidence as proof of the consistency of her conduct and as confirmatory of her testimony regarding the offence, but not as independent or substantive evidence to prove the truth of the charge. Whether or not the complaint was made within a time sufficiently short after the commission of the offence as to admit evidence of the particulars of the complaint, is a question to be decided by the Court under the circumstances of the particular case; but it is nevertheless the province of the jury to take into consideration the time which intervened in weighing the probability of its truth. R. v. Riendeau (1901), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 421, 10 Que. K.B. 584.

Upon a charge of rape, statements made by the complainant to a police officer on the day after the offence was alleged to have been committed and in response to his inquiries, the complainant having on the day of the offence complained to others of an assault but not of rape, are not admissible in evidence either as part of the res gestæ or as in corroboration. But if the jury acquit the accused of that offence but find him guilty of indecent assault, the verdict should stand notwithstanding the improper admissions in evidence of statements so made by the complainant after the alleged offence, if the other evidence in the case is ample to warrant the verdict of indecent assault. R. v. Graham (1899), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 22 (Ont.).

Where the complainant makes a statement to a third party, not in the presence of the accused, such statement may be given in evidence, provided it is shewn to have been made at the first opportunity which reasonably offered itself after the commission of the offence, and has not been elicited by questions of a leading and inducing or intimidating nature. R. v. Spuzzum (1906), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 287.

Where the depositions at the preliminary enquiry on which an indictment for rape is founded shew that the statements of the prosecutrix relied upon by the Crown to shew a complaint were not made spontaneously, but in answer to questions by the police officer, evidence of the answers so made is admissible against the accused at the trial. R. v. Bishop (1906), 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 30.

Indictment.—A prosecution for rape is in fact and in substance a prosecution for any offence of which, on an indictment for rape, the prisoner could have been found guilty; and the maxim Omne majus continet in se minus applies. R. v. West, [1898] 1 Q.B. 174; R. v. Edwards (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 96.

An indictment may now be laid under Cr. Code secs. 856 and 951 charging rape and also assault with intent to commit rape.

Attempted Rape.—Code sec. 300.

Capacity.—A boy under fourteen is incapable of committing rape, but Code sec. 72 would seem to render such a boy liable to punishment for an attempt to commit rape.

Jurisdiction to Try.—Although a County Court Judge in the Province of New Brunswick has no jurisdiction to try this offence, he may proceed to try the offence of attempting to have carnal knowledge of a girl under fourteen (Cr. Code 302), although the evidence discloses the offence of attempting to commit rape. Code sec. 583; R. v. Wright (1896), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 83. The same rule applies to restrict the jurisdiction of Courts of general sessions. Sec. 583.

Section 296 of the Code includes as an indictable offence for which two years' imprisonment may be imposed, the case of any one assaulting any person "with intent to commit any indictable offence," but would probably be held to be exclusive of the offence of assault with intent to commit rape, which is in itself, under the decision in John v. The Queen, 15 Can. S.C.R. 384, an attempt to commit rape. But see R. v. Preston, 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 201.

After a commitment upon a charge of "unlawful assault with intent to carnally know," the accused cannot insist upon a trial, without a jury under the Speedy Trial Clauses if the Crown express an intention of indicting him for an attempt to commit rape, which latter offence is beyond the jurisdiction of a County Judge's Criminal Court and is disclosed on the depositions returned. R. v. Preston (1905), 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 201 (B.C.).

On the trial for an attempt to commit rape if the only issue involved is as to the identity of the prisoner, it is unnecessary for the trial Judge to point out to the jury that the law permits the finding of a lesser offence than the one charged. R. v. Clarke (1907), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 300 (N.B.).

Evidence of Complaint.—On the trial of an indictment for an attempt to commit rape statements of the person assaulted, and of her companion present at the beginning of the assault, made to police officers, some four hours after the assault; and that they had given a description of the assailant, but not stating what the description was; and evidence of the officers that in consequence of such description they had looked for the assailant, were properly received, although statements of a like character had previously been made to other persons. And where the prosecutrix on cross-examination had stated that she had given a description of her assailant in the presence of her father, and that in consequence of such description her father had suspected a person other than the prisoner, the Crown was properly allowed to prove by the father what the description was that his daughter had given in his presence. R. v. Clarke (1907), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 300 (N.B.).

Punishment for Attempt.—Code sec. 300.

Sec. 2.—Of Unlawful Carnal Knowledge of Idiots, Imbecile and Lunatic Females.—Code sec. 219.

Corroborative Evidence Essential—Code sec. 1002.

Sec. 3.—Of Unlawful Carnal Knowledge of Girls Under Fourteen.—Code sec. 301.

Capacity.—The common law presumption of the physical incapacity of a boy under fourteen to have carnal knowledge would be a defence to a charge of this offence. R. v. Hartlen, 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 12.

Unsworn Evidence by Girl Under Fourteen.—Code sec. 1002.

Canada Evidence Act.—R.S.C. (1906) ch. 145.

Consent.—Carnal knowledge alone constitutes an offence under this section when the girl is under the age of fourteen and her consent to the act is not a defence. R. v. Brice, 7 Man. R. 627; R. v. Chisholm, 7 Man. R. 613.

When there has been no violence, and the girl is under fourteen and has consented or complied, the offence falls under art. 301; but when there has been violence, and when the girl has not consented, then, notwithstanding the fact that the girl is under fourteen years of age, the crime is rape, and falls under sec. 298. R. v. Riopel (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 225, 228. The word “man” and “woman” in this section are to be taken in a general or generic sense as indicating all males and females of the human race, and not in a restricted sense as distinguished from boys and girls. R. v. Riopel (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 225.

Indictment.—The words “not being his wife” in sec. 301, providing for the offence of defiling children under fourteen, is an exception, the failure to negative which in the indictment will not invalidate a conviction thereon where no objection was taken before pleading. The King v. Wright, 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 221.

The offence of carnal knowledge of a girl under fourteen years includes the offence of indecent assault, and a trial for the greater offence is a trial also for the lesser offence included therein, and the accused may, although found not guilty of the greater offence, be convicted for such lesser offence, if proved, under the same charge or indictment. R. v. Cameron (1901), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 385 (Ont.). A police magistrate trying an accused with his consent summarily, upon the charge of carnal knowledge, has the same power to convict of the lesser offence as a Court of general sessions would have upon a trial under an indictment. Ibid. And an acquittal by the police magistrate on such summary trial is a bar to a charge upon a fresh information for indecent assault in respect of the same occurrence. Ibid. An indictment for rape under secs. 298 and 299 lies against one who has ravished a female under the age of fourteen years against her will, notwithstanding this section. R. v. Riopel (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 225; R. v. Ratcliffe (1882), 15 Cox C.C. 127; R. v. Dicker (1877), 14 Cox C.C. 8.

Section 951 authorizes a verdict of indecent assault, the consent of a girl under fourteen not being material to that offence; sec. 294; R. v. Cameron (1901), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 385 (Ont.); or if the complete commission of the offence under sec. 301 is not proved, but the evidence establishes an attempt to commit the offence, the accused may be convicted of such attempt and punished accordingly. Sec. 949.

Attempt to Have Carnal Knowledge.—Code sec. 302.

The presumption of physical incapacity by a boy under fourteen to have carnal knowledge would seem to be over-riden in reference to this and similar offences by Code sec. 72.

Corroboration.—Upon the trial of a charge of attempted carnal knowledge of a girl under fourteen who is too young to understand the nature of an oath, a conviction for that offence is not warranted unless her evidence not under oath is corroborated by some other material evidence implicating the accused (Code sec. 1003), but the accused may be convicted of common assault upon the charge so laid if there be corroboration merely by some other material evidence (Can. Evidence Act, sec. 16). The King v. De Wolfe, 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 38.

Alibi.—It is misdirection entitling the accused to a new trial for the trial Judge to charge the jury that the onus is upon the accused to prove an alibi set up in defence by a preponderance of testimony. The King v. Myshrall, 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 474, 35 N.B.R. 507.

Punishment.—Under this section everyone found guilty of an indecent assault on a female is liable to two years' imprisonment and to be whipped; but the Court in many cases, acting under the discretion conferred by the special proviso contained in sec. 1028 of the Code, does not inflict the whipping, and imposes only an imprisonment. R. v. Robidoux (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 19.

Complaint.—In an Ontario case it has been held that in a civil action for damages under circumstances constituting the criminal offence of indecent assault, evidence is admissible of complaint made by the woman shortly after the assault was committed, in like manner as upon a criminal trial; and that complaint made by the woman to her husband, on her first meeting him some hours after the assault, but on the same day, was admissible in evidence under the circumstances of the case. The proof of such complaint by the evidence of both the woman and her husband is corroborative of the woman's evidence that she did not consent to the acts complained of. Hopkinson v. Perdue, 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 286. Where evidence of complaint is admissible on a charge of indecent assault, not only the fact of complaint may be shewn, but the particulars of the complaint. Ibid.

It is essential in all cases of indecent assault that complaint should have been made at the earliest opportunity after the offence, and evidence of such complaint may, under special circumstances, be received after the lapse of several days' delay. The fact of the girl being only seven years of age, that the act was committed without violence and that the girl did not realize the serious nature of the act, are circumstances which make a complaint made ten days afterwards admissible in evidence. R. v. Barron (1905), 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 196 (N.S.).

Under exceptional circumstances evidence of a complaint made by an adult female of an indecent assault may be admitted although five days had intervened between the assault and the complaint. R. v. Smith (1905), 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 21 (N.S.).

CHAPTER THE TENTH.

OF ABDUCTION OF FEMALES.

Common Law.—It appears not to be an indictable offence at common law for a man to marry a woman under age, without the consent of her father or guardian (a). But children might be taken from their parents or guardians by violence, conspiracy, or other improper practices in such a way as would render the act an offence at common law, though the parties themselves might be consenting to the marriage (b).

Various forms of abduction of wards and women have been made the subject of legislation from the time of Henry III. (Statute of Merton) down to 1885 (c). The enactments still effectively in force are as follows:

Abduction of Girls under Sixteen.—By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 55, 'Whosoever shall unlawfully take or cause to be taken any unmarried girl, being under the age of sixteen years, out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother, or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour' (d). The provisions of the Children Act, 1908, Part II. apply to offences under this section (dd).

It is no defence to an indictment under this section that the girl looked over sixteen, or told the defendant that she was over sixteen, or that he bona fide and reasonably believed her to be over sixteen (e), or Lord Grey* [1682], 9 St. Tr. 127. 1 East, P. C. 460. This case was in the nature of ravishment of ward, and Wright (on Conspiracy, p. 106) considers it not to be a case of conspiracy at all, vide ante, p. 158.

(dd) Vide ante, pp. 918–924.

(e) R. v. Prince, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 154. This case was not argued for the prisoner. Brett, J., the only dissentient judge, said: 'Upon all the cases I think it is proved that there can be no conviction for crime in England in the absence of a criminal mind or mens rea. Then comes the question, what is the true meaning of the phrase? I do not doubt that it exists where the prisoner knowingly does acts which would constitute a crime, if the result were as he anticipated, but in which the result may not improbably end by bringing the offence within a more serious class of crime. As if a man strike with a dangerous weapon with intent to do grievous bodily harm, and kills. The result makes the crime murder. The prisoner has run the risk. So if a prisoner do the prohibited acts without caring to consider what the truth is as to facts. As if a prisoner were to abduct a girl under sixteen, without caring to consider whether she was in truth under sixteen. He runs the risk. So if he, without abduction, defiles a girl who is in fact under ten years old, with a belief that she is between ten and twelve. If the facts were as he believed, he would be committing the lesser crime. Then he runs the risk of his crime resulting in the greater crime. It is clear that ignorance of the law does not excuse. It seems to me to follow that the maxim as to mens rea applies whenever the facts which are present to the prisoner's mind, and which he has reasonable grounds to believe, and does believe, to be the facts, would, if true, make his acts no criminal had no means of ascertaining her age (f). He is bound at his peril to find out her age (g).

The enactment seems to extend to the taking of a natural daughter from the care and custody of her putative father (h), or from the mother, though she has married again, and the second husband has assented to the taking away (i).

Unlawfully.—The enactment does not require the presence of a corrupt motive or particular intent, so that the absence of such motive or intent is no answer to the criminal charge (j). But an honest belief in the existence of a right in favour of the prisoner to the custody of the girl may suffice to justify acquittal (k).

The enactment does not include the word ‘detain.’

Take or Cause to be Taken.—The taking need not be by force, actual or constructive, physical or moral, and it is immaterial whether or not the girl consents (l), or whether the proposal that she should go away emanates from the defendant or from the girl (m).

Questions have arisen whether decoying or enticing away as distinct from actual taking falls within the enactment (n). It seems now to be established that persuasion or blandishment by the defendant to the girl to leave her home, if effective, is within the statute; but that where the active part is by the girl and not by the man he is not liable to conviction (o).

offence at all. It may be true to say that the meaning of the word “unlawfully” is that the prohibited acts be done “without justification or excuse.” I, of course, agree that if there be a legal justification there can be no crime. But I come to the conclusion that a mistake of facts on reasonable grounds, to the extent that, if the facts were as believed, the acts of the prisoner would make him guilty of no criminal offence at all, is an excuse, and that such excuse is implied in every criminal charge and every criminal enactment in England.

Bramwell, B.: ‘What the statute contemplates, and what I say is wrong, is the taking of a female of such tender years that she is properly called a girl, can be said to be in another’s possession and in that other’s care or charge. No argument is necessary to prove this. It is enough to state the case. The Legislature has enacted that if any one does this wrong act, he does it at the risk of her turning out to be under sixteen. This opinion gives full scope to the doctrine of the mens rea. If the taker believed he had the father’s consent, though wrongly, he would have no mens rea; so if he did not know she was in any one’s possession, nor in the care or charge of any one. In those cases he would not know he was doing the act forbidden by the statute, an act which if he knew she was in possession and in care or charge of any one, he would know was a crime or not, according as she was under sixteen or not. He would not know he was doing an act wrong in itself, whatever was his intention if done without lawful cause.’ See the discussion of the case in R. v. Tolson, 23 Q.B.D. 168; and as to mens rea, ante, p. 101.

(o) R. v. Jarvis, 20 Cox, 249, Jelf, J.

The prisoner met in the street a girl under sixteen, and persuaded her to go with him to a neighbouring city. He there seduced her, and afterwards, on the same day, accompanied her back, and parted with her in the street where he had met her. The girl lived with her parents at home, and immediately returned there. The prisoner made no inquiries, and had no knowledge of whether the girl's parents were even living or not, but he did not believe she was a prostitute:—Held, that there was no evidence to support a conviction under sect. 55 (p).

If the girl, while living with her father, leaves his house for a mere temporary purpose, intending to return to it, she is still in his possession within the meaning of the statute; and if when so out of the house the defendant induces her to run away with him, he is guilty of an offence within sect. 55 (q).

Although it seems that a man is not bound to return a girl under sixteen to her father's custody when she has left home without any inducement, and come to him (r), yet if he has at any time held out an inducement to her, and she, acting upon that, comes to him at a time unexpected by him, and he then induces her to continue away from her father's custody, he is guilty (s).

On an indictment for taking a girl under sixteen, out of the possession of her father, it appeared that the prisoner lived near the girl's home, and had known her a considerable time. Six months previously, the father, hearing that the girl went to the prisoner's house, remonstrated with him for encouraging her to go there; the prisoner replied that he did not want girls for the purpose of intercourse, as he was old and under medical treatment. One Sunday she left her father's house to go, as she said, to the Sunday school, but did not return. In fact she went to the prisoner's house, and was found there a month afterwards. A youth proved that the prisoner had told him to bring that young girl if he could. He had told a policeman that he had the girl to do his work, as he had no servant. The girl stated that she had for two years been in the habit of going to his house occasionally, and that he had tried to persuade her to come and live with him, and had promised her a new dress if she came, and that when she came he promised to provide for her in his will, and persuaded her to sleep with him. Pollock, C.B., directed the jury that if they believed that the prisoner by promises or persuasion enticed the girl away from her father, and so got her out of his possession, and into his own, they should find him guilty, otherwise if she came without any previous inducement or enticement (t).

(p) R. v. Hibbert, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 184, Pigott, B., doubted. Bovill, C.J., said: 'In the case before us there is no statement or finding of the fact that the prisoner knew, or had reason to know, that the girl was under the charge of her father or mother or any other lawful guardian. Circumstances might exist to negative the presumption that she was in any such care, as if the girl were upon the town, though that does not appear to be the case here. So, on the other hand, there might be circumstances from which it might be inferred that the prisoner knew, or had reasonable cause to know, that the girl was under such care; but no such facts are found by the case to have existed. In the absence of any such finding, we think that the conviction should be quashed.' See R. v. Green, 3 F. & F. 274, and see per Brett, in R. v. Prince, ante, p. 959, note (e).

Where the suggestion to go away came from the girl herself and the defendant merely yielded to her suggestion, it was held that he should be acquitted (u).

Out of the Possession.—A father is at common law entitled to the custody of his child until it attains the age of twenty-one or marries under that age (v), or unless there be some sufficient reason to the contrary (w), but sixteen is described as the age of emancipation for the purpose of poor law settlement and maintenance. The word in the statute is ‘possession,’ which involves more than the legal right to custody.

Against the Will.—Where the parent, &c., is induced to let the girl be taken out of his possession by fraudulent representations it would seem that the taking is against his will within the meaning of the enactment.

On an indictment under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 20 (x), for the abduction of a girl under sixteen years of age, it appeared that the prisoner pretended that he had heard of a place for the girl; the mother said that the child was too young, being only between ten and eleven years of age; but the prisoner said she was quite old enough, for he only wanted her to go to S. with a lady to nurse a baby, and to go on errands. The prisoner called the same day and took the child away, saying the lady was too ill to come herself. He did not, however, take her to any lady, but kept her with him from Monday till Friday, and slept with her every night, and then took her home. The father proved that he parted with the child on the representation that she was to go to live with a lady, which he believed to be true. For the Crown it was argued that the consent of the father having been obtained by the fraudulent representations of the prisoner, was no consent at all; for the prisoner it was contended that the abduction was not complete, for the child was brought back; if this were an abduction, any seducing away of a girl for an hour would be an abduction; there was no intention shewn to deprive the parents of the child. Gurney, B., left it to the jury to say whether the father was induced to part with the possession of the child by the fraudulent representations made by the prisoner (y).

In Hicks v. Gore (z), where a widow, fearing that her daughter, who was a rich heiress, might be seduced into an improvident marriage, placed her under the care of a female friend, who sent for her son from abroad, and married him openly in the church, and during canonical hours, to the heiress, before she attained the age of sixteen, and without the consent of her mother, who was her guardian; it was held that in order to bring the offence within the statute (4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 8, rep.) it must appear some artifice was used, that the elopement was secret, and that the would have been reserved had not the prisoner been convicted and sentenced on another indictment. The mother proved that she would have let the child go with the prisoner if he had told her that she was to go and live with him as his servant; but Gurney, B., held that this could not affect the case.

(z) 3 Mod. 84. 1 Hawk, c. 41, s. 11.

marriage was to the disparagement of the family. But in this case no stress appears to have been laid upon the circumstance of the mother having placed the child under the care of the friend, by whose procurement the marriage was effected; and that it deserves good consideration before it is decided that an offender, acting in collusion with one who has the temporary custody of another's child, for a special purpose, and knowing that the parent or guardian did not consent, was not within the statute; for that then every schoolmistress might dispose, in the same manner, of the children committed to her care (a). It was said that there must be a continued refusal of the parent or guardian; and that if they once agreed it was an assent within 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 8, notwithstanding any subsequent dissent (b); but this was not the point in judgment; and it needs further confirmation (c).

It was no legal excuse for the offence under 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c. 8, that the defendant made use of no other means than the common blandishments of a lover, to induce the lady secretly to elope and marry him, if it appeared that the father intended to marry her to another person, and so that the taking was against his consent (d).

In R. v. Kipps (e), on an indictment under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 20, it appeared that the girl was between fifteen and sixteen years of age, and the prisoner had for several months corresponded with her, and paid her the attentions of a lover, though he was a married man, and had endeavoured to persuade her to leave her home, where she was living with her parents, and ultimately prevailed upon her to meet him at a place in the village where they were both living, which accordingly she did, when they left the village together. There was no suggestion of any force or fraud used by the prisoner in inducing the girl to consent to elope with him. It was urged that there was no taking within the meaning of the Act, as the girl went voluntarily with the prisoner, and R. v. Meadows (f) was relied upon; for the Crown, R. v. Robins (g) and R. v. Biswell (h) were cited. Maule, J., said: 'If the construction apparently put upon the statute in R. v. Meadows be the right construction, the Act can hardly ever be violated, except in the case of children in arms. It rarely or never happens that the abductor takes away a girl of fourteen or fifteen in his arms, or upon his back; so that such an interpretation would make the statute inoperative. The law throws a protection about young persons of the sex and within the age specified by the statute. It has been determined by the legislature, that at that age young females are not able to protect themselves, or give any binding consent to a matter a distinction between an offence under sect. 20 of the 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, and under sect. 21; and I am inclined to think, that to bring a case within sect. 20 [which is similar to 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 55], there must be an actual taking or causing to be taken away; and a mere decoying or enticement away which would be an offence within sect. 21, would not constitute one under sect. 20.' of this description. It is therefore quite immaterial whether the girl abducted consent or not ; if her family, that is to say, those who under the statute may lawfully have the possession and control over her, do not consent to her departure, the offence is completed.'

In R. v. Mankletow (i), upon a similar indictment, it appeared that the prisoner had stated to the father that he intended to emigrate to America, and a short time before his departure he had privately persuaded the girl, who was between twelve and thirteen, to go with him to America, and on the morning of his departure he had secretly told her to put her things in a bundle, and to walk to a place where he would meet her ; she did so, and the prisoner, having parted with her father in a road, met her at the place appointed, and they travelled together to London, where he was apprehended, and then said he had paid the girl's passage to London, and was going to take her to America. For the prisoner it was urged that as the girl went voluntarily there was no taking within the meaning of the statute, and R. v. Meadows (ii) was cited. R. v. Robins (j) was cited on the other side, and it was stated that Maule, J., at a previous assize, had declined to act on R. v. Meadows. Coleridge, J., overruled the objection, and told the jury that the girl was in the father's possession while in his house, although he was not actually in it ; that the taking need not be by force, nor against the girl's will ; and that if the prisoner by persuasion induced her to leave her father's roof against his will, in order to her going with him to America, the case was within the statute ; and, upon a case reserved, it was held that the conviction was right. In a case like the present the taking need not be by force, actual or constructive, and it is immaterial whether or not the girl consents. The Act was passed to protect parents and others having the lawful charge or custody, and it is therefore immaterial whether the taking be with or without the consent of the girl. And as to the taking of the girl out of the possession of the father, a manual possession is not necessary ; if the girl be a member of the family, and under the father's control, there is a sufficient possession. If a girl leaves her father's house for a particular purpose, with his sanction, she cannot legally be said to be out of his possession. Here the father had possession until the very act of taking (jj).

In R. v. Handley (k), on a similar indictment against a man and a woman, it appeared that the girl had become acquainted with the female prisoner, and at her house met the male prisoner, and she and the prisoners met frequently, and at last she left her father's house, as she said, to go

(jj) Parke, B., said: 'Supposing the girl to have abandoned her father's possession, and the prisoner then to take her away, it would not come within the statute. But supposing she conditionally abandoned the possession of her father under the impression that the prisoner would be at a certain point to take her away, that would not be a determination of the father's possession.'

On R. v. Meadows being cited, Jervis, C.J., observed that 'the girl, by voluntarily going from her father's house, may have severed the possession of the father, and so could not be said to be taken out of the possession of her father. I do not find that in R. v. Kipps that point was brought before my brother Maule's mind'; and at the end of his judgment he added, 'I do not think the case of R. v. Kipps interferes at all with the decision of R. v. Meadows.'

for a walk, at the same time saying that she should return in an hour, but she did not return ; and the same evening her brother went to the house of the female prisoner, who denied having seen her ; and it was afterwards discovered that she had left the same night, and she was afterwards found in a low lodging together with the male prisoner ; the girl had taken some wearing apparel to the house of the female prisoner the day before she left home, and she had advised her to go away with the male prisoner ; it was contended that there was nothing to shew that the girl's going away was not entirely voluntarily. Wightman, J., told the jury, that ' this offence is complete under the statute which creates it without any reference to the object for which the girl may be taken. You must be satisfied that the girl was under sixteen years of age, and that her father was unwilling that she should go away, and it must be assumed to be so, if it appears that, had he been asked, he would have refused his consent. You must also be satisfied that the prisoners, or one of them, took the girl out of the possession of her father. For this purpose a taking by force was not necessary ; it is sufficient if such moral force was used as to create a willingness on the girl's part to leave her father's house. If, however, the going away was entirely voluntary on the part of the girl, the prisoners would not be guilty of an offence under this statute

In R. v. Baillie (l), on a similar indictment the prisoner was proved to have lodged in the house of the girl's father, and he and the girl became engaged, and he induced her to go with him to a Roman Catholic chapel, where they were married ; but she immediately returned to her father's house, and continued to live there as before ; and the marriage had never been consummated ; the father did not know of the marriage till two or three weeks afterwards ; it was urged that the girl had never been taken out of her father's possession within the meaning of the Act ; it was answered that the marriage without the father's consent was an abduction within the meaning of the Act, and after the marriage the father had no legal control over the girl. It was held that this case was within the Act ; the girl could not be considered to be in her father's possession, although she was in his house ; because she was in the lawful possession of her husband, and the father could never have the custody of her in the same sense as before her marriage. The distance she was taken, and the time she was kept away, were immaterial, her husband having power to take her away whenever he liked, and her whole relationship to her father being altered by the marriage.

In R. v. Timmins (m), on a similar indictment it appeared that the prisoner was well known to the girl, and she had on a former occasion slept with him a whole night ; and that on a Sunday she met the prisoner, and they went to London together, and spent three days in visiting places of public entertainment, sleeping together at night, and on Wednesday morning, on getting up, the prisoner said to her, ' I 'll go to work, and you go home ' : they separated, and the girl went home ; the father swore that his daughter was absent without his knowledge and against his will.

The jury found that the father did not consent, and that the prisoner knew he did not consent, and that the prisoner took the girl away with him in order to gratify his passions, and then allowed her to return home, and did not intend to keep her away permanently. Upon a case reserved upon the question, whether, on the facts so found, any offence had been committed under the statute, Erle, C.J., delivered judgment: 'We are of opinion that the conviction must be affirmed. The statute was passed for the protection of parents, and for preventing unmarried girls from being taken out of the possession of their parents against their will; and it is clear that no deception or forwardness on the part of the girl in such cases can prevent the person taking her away from being guilty of the offence created by this section. The difficulty which we have is to say what constitutes a taking out of the possession of the father. The taking away might be consistent with the possession of the father, if the girl went away with the party intending to return in a short time; but when a person takes a girl away from the possession of her father, and keeps her away against his will for a length of time, as in this case, keeping her away from her home for three nights, and cohabiting with her during that time, we think the evidence justified the jury in finding the taking to be a taking out of the possession of the father within the meaning of the statute. The prisoner took the girl away from under her father's roof, and placed her in a situation quite inconsistent with the father's possession. In our judgment, therefore, the jury were justified in their verdict by the evidence before them, which we consider to be the point submitted to us, although the prisoner did not intend the taking to be permanent, but when his lust was gratified intended to cast the girl from him. We limit our judgment to the facts of this particular case. It may be that a state of facts might arise upon which the offence would be complete in law when the girl passed her father's threshold, as where she is taken away with the intention of keeping her away permanently; but we mean it to be understood, that, although we affirm this conviction, we do not intend to say that a person would be liable to conviction under the section if it should appear that the taking was intended to be temporary only, or for a purpose not inconsistent with the relation of father and child. It is sufficient for us to say that in this case the conviction was justified by the evidence' (n).'

In R. v. Tinkler (o), on a similar indictment it appeared that the girl was the younger sister of the prisoner's deceased wife, and had lived in his house up to the time of his wife's death, but on that occasion another married sister had caused her to be placed under the care of another woman, and no improper motive was alleged against the prisoner, he having alleged as his reason for taking the child away that he had promised her father on his death-bed to take care of her. Cockburn, C.J., told the jury that it was clear that the prisoner had no right to take the child out of the woman's custody. But as no improper motive was suggested, it might be concluded that the prisoner wished the child to live with him, and that he meant to discharge the promise he had made to her father, and that he did not suppose he was breaking the law when he took the child away. If the jury should take this view of the case, and be of opinion that the prisoner honestly believed that he had a right to the custody of the child, then, although the prisoner was not legally justified, he would be entitled to be acquitted.

In R. v. Primelt (p), on a similar indictment it appeared that the girl was more than fifteen, but in appearance three years older and very prepossessing, and lived with her mother, a widow; on the evening of the alleged abduction she left her mother's house at nine o'clock to spend the night at a married sister's, but, joining company with another girl, they went to a public-house, where they met the two prisoners, and from thence went to another public-house, where they met the prisoners again by appointment, and thence to the farming premises of one of the prisoners, where they remained till four o'clock in the morning; it was then proposed that they all should go to London, which they did, and stayed the day there, and one of the prisoners slept with the girl, and the other with her companion, and returned the next day. The mother swore that it was not by her consent that the girl had gone away, and that she had inquired everywhere for her without success; but the girl stated that she occasionally went to dances at public-houses, and was occasionally out late at night without anyone to look after her, and that her mother on these occasions left the door on the latch, or came down and let her in; that the prisoner who slept with her was not the first man who had had connection with her. Cockburn, C.J., directed the jury that there was no case against the other prisoner; and as to this prisoner, if they thought that the mother had by her conduct countenanced the daughter in a lax course of life, by permitting her to go out alone at night and to dance at public-houses, this was not a case that came within the intent of the statute; but was one where what had occurred, though unknown to her, could not be said to have happened against her will (q).

Abduction of Girls under Eighteen.—By the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), s. 7, 'Any person who, with intent that any unmarried girl under the age of eighteen years should be unlawfully and carnally known by any man, whether such carnal knowledge is intended to be with any particular man, or generally—takes or causes to be taken such girl out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother, or any other person having the lawful care or charge of her, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.

'Provided that it shall be a sufficient defence to any charge under this section if it shall be made to appear to the Court or jury that the person so charged had reasonable cause (r) to believe that the girl was of or above the age of eighteen years' (s).

It must be proved that the girl was taken out of the possession of the person mentioned in the indictment. Whether the girl was in her father's possession seems to be a question of fact for the jury (t). A girl employed as a barmaid at some distance from her home was held not to be in possession of her father (u). Under this enactment the intent is an essential element in the offence. As to proof of age vide ante, p. 954. The father or mother should be called to prove that he or she did not consent (v).

The word 'taking' in this enactment has the same meaning as in 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 55 (w). The enactment does not apply when the girl has left her home without any inducement from the defendant (x).

The willingness of the girl to go with the defendant is no answer to an indictment under the section, which protects parental and public rights.

Abduction of Heiresses (y).—By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 53, 'Where any woman of any age shall have any interest, whether legal or equitable, present or future, absolute, conditional, or contingent, in any real or personal estate, or shall be a presumptive heiress or coheiress, or presumptive next of kin, or one of the presumptive next of kin, to any one having such interest, whosoever shall, from motives of lucre, take away or detain such woman against her will, with intent to marry or carnally know her, or to cause her to be married or carnally known by any other person; and whosoever shall fraudulently allure, take away, or detain such woman, and being under the age of twenty-one years, out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother, or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her, with intent to marry or carnally know her, or to cause her to be married or carnally known by any other person, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years . . . (z); and whosoever shall be convicted of any offence against this section shall be incapable of taking any estate or interest, legal or equitable in any real or personal property of such woman, or in which she shall have any such interest, or which shall come to her as such heiress, coheiress, or next of kin as aforesaid; and if any such marriage as aforesaid shall have taken place, such property shall upon such conviction be settled in such manner as the Court of Chancery in England or Ireland shall upon any information at the suit of the Attorney-General appoint' (a).

(a) This section combines the provisions of 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 19 (E) and 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 23 (I). The words in italics in the first branch of the clause were introduced to avoid a doubt which might have been raised, whether the cases they expressly include were within the former enactments. In the second branch, the age of twenty-one is substituted for eighteen in 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 23 (I).

By sect. 54 (b), 'Whosoever shall, by force, take away or detain against her will any woman, of any age, with intent to marry or carnally know her, or to cause her to be married or carnally known by any other person, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years . . . ' (bb).

Decisions on Former Statutes.—It was made a question of considerable doubt, whether persons 'receiving wittingly the woman so taken against her will, and knowingly the same,' were ousted of clergy by 18 Eliz. c. 7 (c). But it was agreed that those who received the offender, knowingly, were only accessories after the fact, according to the rule of the common law (d). Those who were only privy to the marriage, but in no way parties or consenting to the forcible taking away were not within the statute (e).

It was no sort of excuse that the woman was at first taken away with her own consent, if she afterwards refused to continue with the offender and was forced against her will; for till the time when the force was put upon her, she was in her own power; and she might from that time as properly be said to be taken against her will, as if she had never given any consent (f). Getting a woman inveigled out by confederates, and then detaining and taking her away, was a taking within the statute (g). The taking alone did not constitute the offence under 3 Hen. VII. c. 2 (h), and it was necessary that the woman taken away should have been married or defiled by the misdoer, or by some other, with his consent (i). The present enactment makes the taking away or detaining a woman, with intent to marry or carnally know her, a complete offence. Under 3 Hen. VII. c. 2, it was decided, that if the woman were under force at the time of taking, it was not at all material whether she were ultimately married or defiled with her own consent or not; on the ground that an offender should not be considered as exempted from the provisions of the statute by having prevailed over the weakness of a woman, whom he got into his power by such base means (j). And it was also decided that a marriage would be sufficient to constitute the offence, though the woman was in such fear at the time that she knew not what she did (k).

Under 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 23 (I), the girl must have been married or defiled, and by the person taking her away. The section is so altered as to make it correspond with 9 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 19, in both respects. The last part of the clause is framed on 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 23 (I). It is enlarged so as to embrace property that may come to the woman after the marriage; and the High Court is empowered to settle the property in such a manner as it deems fit, instead of its being invested in trustees for the separate use of the wife alone, which was all that 10 Geo. IV. c. 34, s. 23 (I), directed. The Court, therefore, may, in its discretion, settle the property on the issue of the marriage, and in default of such issue, on any relatives of the wife.

Venue.—Under 3 Hen. VII. c. 2, where a woman was taken away forcibly in one county, and afterwards went voluntarily into another county, and was there married or defiled, with her own consent, the fact was not indictable in either county; on the ground that the offence was not complete in either, but that if by her being carried into the second county, or in any other manner, there was a continuing force in that county, the offender might be indicted there, though the marriage or defilement ultimately took place with the woman's own consent (l). The place of trial in such a case is now regulated by 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 12 (ante, p. 20).

The doctrine that there must have been a continuance of the force into the county where the defilement took place, was recognised and acted upon in the following case: The prisoners, a clergyman and his brother, were indicted in the county of Oxford, under 3 Hen. VII. c. 2, for forcible abduction. Certain evidence was given at the trial on the part of the prosecution. Lawrence, J., told the jury that, in order to constitute the offence with which the prisoners were charged, there must be a forcible taking, and a continuance of that force into the county where the defilement takes place, and where the indictment is preferred; that in the present case, though there appeared clearly to have been force used for the purpose of taking the prosecutrix from her house (which was in Middlesex), yet, it appeared also, that in the course of the journey she consented, as she did not ask for assistance at the inns, turnpike gates, &c., where she had opportunities; and that, as she was unable to fix times or places with any precision, this consent probably took place before the parties came into the county of Oxford; and that they must therefore acquit the prisoners (m).

Evidence.—Upon an indictment for abduction under 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 19 (rep.), it was necessary to prove that the prisoner took away the woman from motives of lucre, but his expressions relative to her property were evidence that he was actuated by such motives (n).

An indictment under sect. 53 ought expressly to set forth that the woman taken away had lands or goods, or was presumptive heiress, &c., and that the taking was against her will, and from motives of lucre (o), and with intent to marry or defile, &c. (p).

and W. S. H., he then having the lawful care and charge of her, she being under the age of twenty-one years, and having a present legal interest in real estates, with intent to marry, &c., and H. R. B. was charged with feloniously aiding, &c., to commit the felony. The prisoners were paternal uncles of J. B., who was sixteen years old, and entitled to real estates of the value of £50 a year. Her mother had first married the brother of the prisoners, and after his death she had married W. S. H. J. B. lived with her mother and stepfather till she went to school in January, 1862, where she remained till August, 1862, when she returned to her mother's, and in October she went to another school, whence she returned to her mother's on December 20, in the afternoon; she stayed half an hour, and then left the house alone. About nine o'clock that evening she returned, and stayed till ten, when she again left without her mother's knowledge or consent. She returned the next morning, and stayed with her mother about two hours, and then went away without her mother knowing whither. In fact, she went to the house of her uncle, H. R. B., and she continued there till January 19, 1863. She continued to pay visits to her mother for an hour or two nearly every day till January 19. In the interval between her coming home from the first and her going to the second school, it had been arranged, at her own desire, in consequence of her not living happily with her stepfather and mother, that she should live with her mother's mother and brother. When she came back for the Christmas holidays, she wished to remain with her mother, but the latter insisted on her abiding by her own choice to go to her grandmother's for the holidays, and would not consent to her staying with her at her stepfather's house. On this she went to the house of H. R. B. Her mother, as soon as she discovered that her daughter was there, desired her to come to her house, and refused to let her have her clothes unless she did so. On January 19, F. B. and J. B. left together by railway, and were married the next day at Plumstead. These occurrences took place under such circumstances as fully warranted the jury in finding that J. B. was allured and taken away by F. B., with intent to marry her, and that H. R. B. aided in the committing of this act. It was objected—1, that there was no evidence that F. B. had fraudulently allured away J. B.; 2, that there was no evidence that she was taken out of the possession of her mother; 3, that the indictment charged that she was taken out of the possession of her mother and W. S. H., he having then the lawful charge of her, and that it was necessary to prove that she was in his possession as thus alleged, as well as of her mother; but the only proof was that the guardianship of her person and copyhold estate had been granted to him when she was admitted as tenant of her copyhold estate. Upon a case reserved it was urged—1, that there was no fraudulent alluring away, and that the mere alluring away was not sufficient; 2, there was no evidence that she was taken out of the possession of her mother; 3, that the stepfather had not the lawful care of the girl; he had no general guardianship of her person. In Ratcliffe's case, 3 Co. Rep. 396, it was held that the consent of the stepfather was wholly immaterial; but here the indictment alleged the stepfather to have the lawful custody. (Pollock, C.B.: 'We are all of opinion that the indictment would be supported by shewing that the girl was taken out of the possession and against the will of the mother. The rest might be struck out as surplusage.') For the crown it was urged—1, that in this case the statute did not require any evidence of fraud, but if it did there was sufficient evidence of fraud; 2, the girl was in the possession of the mother; she had never abandoned the possession, and the mere right of possession was sufficient. Pollock, C.B.: 'The Court is divided in opinion on the facts of the case. The opinion of the majority is that the facts do not bear out the prosecution, or, in other words, that the crime has not been established against the prisoners. There is no difference of opinion as to the law of the case.'

ABDUCTION OF FEMALES.

Abduction of Woman, with Intent.—Code sec. 313 (as amended by 8 & 9 Edw. VII. ch. 9).

Abduction of Heiresses.—Code sec. 314(a) (amended by 8 & 9 Edw. VII. ch. 9).

Fraudulently Alluring Heiress Under Twenty-one Against Will of Father or Mother.—Code sec. 314(b) (amended by 8 & 9 Edw. VII. ch. 9).

Evidence must be given on a prosecution under Code sec. 314 as amended by the Code Amendment Act of 1909, to prove that a girl under twenty-one alleged to have been fraudulently detained against her parent's will with intent to marry her, is an heiress or is entitled to real or personal property within the terms of the statute; and such property interest must be alleged in an indictment or charge. R. v. Fielding, 14 Can. Cr. Cas. 486.

Effect of Conviction on Property—Code sec. 314(2).

It need not be shewn that the accused knew that the woman was an heiress or had such an interest in real or personal estate, etc., as is specified in sub-sec. (b). R. v. Kaylor, 1 Dor. Q.B. (Que.) 364.

It may be doubted whether the Dominion Parliament have the legislative authority to enact the sub-sec. 2, particularly as regards the power purported to be conferred upon a Court of competent jurisdiction to make a settlement of the property. The power to legislate as to the "criminal law" is conferred by the British North America Act upon the federal parliament, and the power to legislate as to "property and civil rights" is vested by the same statute in the Provincial Legislatures. Canada Criminal Law of Tremeeear, p. 257.

Abduction of Girls Under Sixteen.—Code sec. 315.

Abduction of Girls Under Fourteen.—Code sec. 316.

In Ontario in the extradition case of R. v. Watts (1902), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 246, 3 O.L.R. 368, it was held that the child's own father may be guilty of child-stealing within the Code, if after a divorce and the award of the custody of the child to the mother, the father wilfully removes the child from her custody. And that an objection by the husband to the validity of the divorce on the ground of collusion cannot, where the collusion is denied on oath, be adjudicated upon by the extradition commissioner, but extradition should be ordered notwithstanding such objection, and the prisoner left to his right to contest the divorce decree at his trial by the foreign Court.

And in a Montreal extradition case, it was afterwards held that where a divorce decree of a Court of competent jurisdiction in the United States has awarded the custody of a child to the father as against the mother, and the mother thereafter removes and conceals the child for the purpose of evading the decree, a prima facie case for extradition is thereby made out against the mother upon a charge of child-stealing. And, semble, the offence of child-stealing under the Code, may be complete against the child's mother although the father, to whom the child's custody has been awarded has never had any actual separate possession of the child. Re Lorenz (1905), 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 158, 7 Que. P.R. 101 (Hall, J.).

Out of the Possession.—To constitute the crime of abducting a girl out of the possession of and against the will of her father under this section, there must be an actual or constructive possession de facto, in the father at the time of the taking. When the girl who was resident with her father in a foreign country, left without his consent and with intent to renounce his protection, and came to Canada, the father's possession ceased, and semble, a possession de jure afterwards established by his following her to the place of flight is not the possession contemplated by the section. R. v. Blythe (1895), 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 263 (B.C.).

If the persuasion to leave and remain away operated wholly in the foreign country, there is no jurisdiction to convict in Canada, as persuasion is a necessary element in such cases of abduction. Ibid.

The girl is none the less in the "possession" of her guardian by reason of having left her guardian's house for a particular purpose with his sanction. R. v. Mondelet (1877), Ramsay's Cases (Que.) 179, 21 L.C. Jur. 154.

CHAPTER THE ELEVENTH.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST NATURE.

SECT. I.—OF INCEST.

THE punishment of certain forms of this offence is regulated by the Punishment of Incest Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 45) (a).

Incest by Male Persons.—Sect. 1.—‘(1) Any male person who has carnal knowledge (b) of a female person, who is to his knowledge his grand-daughter, daughter, sister, or mother (c), shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not less than three years, and not exceeding seven years, or to be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years with or without hard labour: Provided that if on an indictment for any such offence it is proved that the female person is under the age of thirteen years the same punishment may be imposed as may be imposed under section four of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (which deals with the defilement of girls under thirteen years of age).’ (Ante, p. 948.).

‘(2) It is immaterial that the carnal knowledge was had with the consent of the female person.

‘(3) If any male person attempts to commit any such offence as aforesaid, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years with or without hard labour.

‘(3) On the conviction before any Court of any male person of an offence under this section, or of any attempt to commit the same, against any female under twenty-one years of age, it shall be in the power of the Court to divest the offender of all authority over such female, and if the offender is the guardian of such female to remove the offender from such guardianship, and in any such case to appoint any person or persons to be the guardian or guardians of such female during her minority or any less period: Provided that the High Court may at any time vary or rescind the order by the appointment of any other person as such guardian or in any other respect' (d).

(a) Before this Act incest (i.e. carnal intercourse between persons within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity or affinity) was punishable in England and Ireland only by proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts. See Canons of 1603, Nos. 109, 113. 2 Steph. Hist. Cr. L. 396-429. Blackmore v. Briders, Phillim, 359. As to enforcing the order of the Ecclesiastical Court, see 53 Geo. III. c. 127. In Scotland (Act of 1567, c. 14) and in most British colonies the offence is punishable by statute.

(b) See ante, p. 933.

(c) See sect. 3, post, 973. It will be observed that step-parents, &c., and step-children are not included. See R. v. Geddeson [1906], 25 N. Z. L. R. 323, decided on the corresponding section of the Penal Code of New Zealand. In that colony ‘adopting’ parents and ‘adopted’ children are included, because of the special laws of the colony on adoption. R. v. Stanley [1903], 23 N. Z. L. R. 378, 1100.

Incest by Females of or over Sixteen.—By sect. 2, 'Any female person of or above the age of sixteen years who with consent permits her grandfather, father, brother, or son to have carnal knowledge of her (knowing him to be her grandfather, father, brother, or son as the case may be) shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not less than three years, and not exceeding seven years, or to be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding two years.'

Test of Relationship.—By sect. 3, 'In this Act the expressions "brother" and "sister" respectively includes half-brother and half-sister (e), and the provisions of this Act shall apply whether the relationship between the person charged with an offence under this Act and the person with whom the offence is alleged to have been committed, is or is not traced through lawful wedlock.'

The relationship of the parties may be proved by oral evidence supplemented by certified copies of certificates of birth or marriage when available (f). In prosecutions under this Act if the other party to the offence is called for the Crown, his or her evidence will need corroboration in a material particular implicating the accused (ff).

Prosecution of Offences.—By sect. 4, '(1) An offence under this Act shall be deemed to be an offence within, and subject to, the provisions of the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859, and any Act amending the same (g).

'(2) A Court of Quarter Sessions shall not have jurisdiction to inquire of, hear, or determine any indictment for an offence against this Act, or for an attempt to commit any such offence.

'(3) If on the trial of any person for rape, the jury are satisfied that the defendant is guilty of an offence under this Act, but are not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of rape (ante, p. 941), the jury may acquit the defendant of rape and find him guilty of an offence under this Act, and he shall be liable to be punished accordingly' (h).

'If, on the trial of any indictment for an offence under this Act the jury are satisfied that the defendant is guilty of any offence under sections four or five of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (ante, pp. 947-951), but are not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of an offence under this Act, the jury may acquit the defendant of an offence under

(4) 'Section 4 of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898 (post, Book XIII. Chapter V.), shall have effect as if this Act were included in the schedule to that Act.'

By sect. 5, 'All proceedings under this Act are to be held in camera.'

By sect. 6, 'No prosecution for any offence under this Act shall be commenced without the sanction of His Majesty's Attorney-General, but this section shall not apply to any prosecution commenced by or on behalf of the Director of Public Prosecutions.'

Extent.—By sect. 7, 'This Act shall not extend to Scotland.'

Commencement.—By sect. 8, 'This Act may be cited as the Punishment of Incest Act, 1908, and shall come into operation on the first day of January one thousand nine hundred and nine.'

SECT. II.—OF SODOMY AND COGNATE OFFENCES.

In ancient times the punishment of sodomy, peccatum illud horribile, inter Christianos non nominandum, was death (i): but it had ceased to be so highly penal, when 25 Hen. VIII. c. 6 (j) again made it capital.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 61 (k), 'Whosoever shall be convicted of the abominable crime of buggery, committed either with mankind or with any animal, shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude for life . . . ' (l).

On an indictment under this section the defendant may be convicted (and punished under section 62) for an attempt to commit the offence (m).

By sect. 62 (n), 'Whosoever shall attempt to commit the said abominable crime, or shall be guilty of any assault with intent to commit the same, or of any indecent assault upon any male person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable. . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding ten years . . . ' (o).

When the indecent assault is by an adult on a male under sixteen the defendant may consent to be tried summarily and on a summary conviction may be sentenced to imprisonment for not over six months (oo).

The crimes punishable under these sections and solicitation or incitement to commit them are 'infamous crimes' within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 46–48, post, p. 1156, tit. 'Threats.'

(i) 12 Co. Rep. 37. The books differ as to the mode of punishment. According to Britton, a sodomite was to be burnt, Britt. lib. 6, c. 9. In Fleta it is said, pecorantes et sodomitæ in terrâ vivi confodiantur. The Mirror, bk. 1, c. 5, joins it with heresy and apostasy as a form of treason against God (Seld. Society edition, pp. 15, 32, 53). See also Pollock & Maitland Hist. Eng. Law, ii. 554. Steph. Hist. Cr. Law, ii. 429. About the time of Richard I., the practice was to hang a man, and drown a woman, guilty of this offence. 3 Co. Inst. 58.

(j) Repealed as to E. in 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 1).

(k) Taken from 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 5, except the punishment, which under that Act was death.

(l) The minimum term of penal servitude was reduced from ten to three years and the alternative of imprisonment allowed by 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212. The words omitted were repealed in 1892 (S. L. R.).

(m) 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9, post, Vol. ii. p. 1966 'Procedure.'

(n) This section was new law in 1861 except the part in common type, which was taken from 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29.

(o) For other punishments see 54 & 55 Vict. c. 69, s. 1, ante, pp. 211, 212. The omitted words are repealed.

(oo) 8 Edw. 7, c. 67, s. 128(2) and sched. ii.

The offence dealt with by ss. 61, 62 consists in a carnal knowledge committed against the order of nature (p) by man with man; or in the same unnatural manner with woman (q); or by man or woman in any manner with beast (r). The carnal knowledge necessary to constitute this offence is the same that is required in the case of rape (s).

In this offence, as in rape, the crime is complete on proof of penetration, and even if emission be expressly negatived (t).

To constitute this offence the act must be in that part where sodomy is usually committed. The act in a child's mouth does not constitute the offence (u). An unnatural connection with an animal of the fowl kind was considered not to be sodomy, when the fowl was so small that its private parts would not admit those of a man, and were torn away in the attempt (v).

Those who are present aiding and abetting in this offence are all liable as principals (w). If the party on whom the offence is committed is under fourteen (x), it is not felony in him but only in the agent (y). But where one count charged the prisoner with committing an unnatural crime on J. W., and another count charged the prisoner with permitting the said J. W. to commit an unnatural crime with him, and the facts were that the prisoner induced J. W., a boy of twelve years of age, to have carnal knowledge of his person, the prisoner having been the pathic in the crime, and the jury found the prisoner guilty, the judges, upon a case reserved, were unanimously of opinion that the conviction was right (z).

Indictment.—The indictment must charge that the offender contra naturæ ordinem rem habuit veneream, et carnaliter cognovit (a). But it is said, that this alone would not be sufficient; and that, as the statute describes the offence by the term 'buggery,' the indictment should also charge peccatumque illud sodomiticum Anglice dictum buggery adtunc et ibidem nequitur, felonie diaboli ac contra naturam commisit ac perpetravit (b).

Where an indictment alleged that the prisoner did attempt to commit an unnatural crime with 'a certain animal called a bitch,' it was objected that the description was too uncertain, as it might apply to a bitch fox, a bitch otter, or the bitch of some other animal; but Tindal, C. J., held that the description was sufficient (c).

On trials for this offence at least as much strictness should be observed with regard to the evidence and manner of proof as in cases of rape. The evidence should be plain and satisfactory, in proportion as the crime is detestable (d).

Corroboration of the evidence of an accomplice is particularly to be required and a conviction has been quashed where such corroboration was not forthcoming and the judge did not sufficiently warn the jury against convicting on such evidence uncorroborated (e).

A party consenting to the commission of an offence of this kind, whether man or woman, is an accomplice, and requires corroboration. On the trial of an indictment for an unnatural offence by a man upon his own wife, she swore that she resisted as much as she could. Patteson, J., said: 'There was a case of this kind which I had the misfortune to try, and it there appeared that the wife consented. If that had been so here the prisoner must have been acquitted; for although consent or non-consent is not material to the offence, yet as the wife, if she consented, would be an accomplice she would require confirmation; and so it would be with a party consenting to an offence of this kind, whether man or woman' (f).

Where on an indictment for bestiality the offence was alleged to have been committed on December 17, 1842, but no complaint was made to the justices until October, 1844, and the first witness being asked why he did not mention the offence until so long a time had elapsed, said he did so, but it was not to a magistrate, and there was no confession, and nothing offered by the counsel for the prosecution to explain the delay; Alderson, B., told the jury, 'I ought not to allow this case to go further. It is monstrous to put a man on his trial after such a lapse of time. How can he account for his conduct so far back? If you accuse a man of a crime the next day, he may be enabled to bring forward his servants and family to say where he was and what he was about at the time; but if the charge be not preferred for a year or more, how can he clear himself? No man's life would be safe if such a prosecution were permitted. It would be very unjust to put him on his trial' (g).

In the case of offences against ss. 61 & 62 against a child under thirteen it is no defence to prove that the child was a consenting party (h). Mere submission by children is not equivalent to consent (i).

In a prosecution for an unnatural offence, an admission by the prisoner, that he had committed such an offence at another time, and with another person, and that his natural inclination was towards such practices, ought not to be received in evidence (j).

In cases where it is not probable that all the circumstances necessary to constitute this offence will be proved it may be advisable only to prefer an indictment for an assault with intent to commit an unnatural crime. And it should be observed, that the mere soliciting another to the commission of this crime has been treated as an indictable offence (k).

By sect. 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), 'Any male person who, in public or private, commits or is a party to the commission of or procures or attempts to procure the commission by any male person of, any act of gross indecency with another male person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour' (l).

The consent of the other male person is no defence. On a charge under s. 11, where the prisoner had procured the commission by another male person of an act of gross indecency with the prisoner himself, it was held that he had committed an offence against the section (m).

Where an offence under the above section or under sect. 62 of the Act of 1861 is committed with a person under sixteen, the rules of evidence of Part II. of the Children Act, 1898 (8 Edw. VII. c. 67) (n), apply.

The rule as to the admissibility of complaints applying to offences against women (o) appears not to apply to a criminal prosecution for the offences with male persons referred to in this chapter (p).

Offences against sect. 61 of the Act of 1861 and sect. 11 of the Act of 1885 are not triable at Quarter Sessions (q), but an offence against sect. 62 of the Act of 1861 is there triable.

(k) See R. v. Ransford, 13 Cox, 9, and a precedent of an indictment for such a solicitation, 2 Chit. Cr. L. 50. Osborne* was applied by Sir Lewis Dibdin, to proceedings under the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, in respect to misconduct by a clergyman with choir boys. Acting on the rule he admitted a statement made by a boy to his mother in answer to questions on the day of and very soon after the alleged offence and excluded a further statement made on the next day when pressed by his mother and after he had been mixing all day with his schoolfellows.

CANADIAN NOTES.

OF OFFENCES AGAINST NATURE.

Sec. 1.—Of Incest, Punishment for.—Code sec. 204.

Prior to the statute, 53 Vict. (Can.) ch. 37, sec. 8, from which this section is taken, it seems that incest, unless committed under circumstances amounting to rape, was not punishable in Ontario, as the ecclesiastical law of England was not introduced into that province. Re Lord Bishop of Natal, 3 Moo. P.C. (N.S.) 115.

There were, however, statutes dealing with the offence in the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. R.S.N.S. (3rd series), ch. 160, sec. 2; R.S.N.B. ch. 145, sec. 2; 24 Vict. (P.E.I.) ch. 27, sec. 3. Quære, whether those statutes do not still apply in those provinces as to cases of incest, for which no provision is made by sec. 176.

Capacity.—On the principle of R. v. Hartlen, 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 12, a boy under fourteen could not be convicted of this offence.

Attempt to Commit.—An attempt to commit incest is an indictable offence punishable by seven years' imprisonment. Code sec. 570.

By Threats.—See Code sec. 216(g). See notes on "attempts," at end of chapter 6, Book 1.

Evidence.—Oral evidence is not admissible to prove relationship on a charge of incest in the Province of Quebec, and the relationship must be established by the production of extracts from the registers of civil status, as required by the provincial laws of evidence made applicable to criminal proceedings by the Canada Evidence Act, sec. 35, unless the absence of such registers is proved. R. v. Garneau (1899), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 69 (Que.). It is not too late for the accused to object that oral evidence is insufficient proof, after the case for the prosecution has been closed.

Buggery, Penetration Sufficient.—Code sec. 7.

Buggery, Attempt to Commit.—Code sec. 203.

Indecent Assault on Males, Punishment for.—Code sec. 293.

Consent Procured by Fraud.—Code sec. 292(b).

Capacity.—Although a boy under fourteen cannot be convicted of sodomy, he may if the act be committed against the will of the other party be punished for an assault under this section. R. v. Hartlen (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 12; R. v. Allen, 1 Dennison's Cr. Cas. 364.

It is suggested that a boy under fourteen could, however, be convicted of an attempt to commit sodomy. (See the comments at the end of Book 1, ch. 6.)

Evidence.—Upon the trial of the prisoner, a school teacher, for an indecent assault upon one of his scholars, it appeared that he forbade the prosecutrix telling her parents what had happened, and they did not hear of it for two months. After the prosecutrix had given evidence of the assault, evidence was tendered of the conduct of the prisoner towards her subsequent to the assault. Held, that the evidence was admissible as tending to shew the indecent quality of the assault, and as being in effect a part or continuation of the same transaction as that with which the prisoner was charged. Per Hagarty, C.J., and Armour, J.—The evidence was properly admissible as evidence in chief. Reg. v. James Chute, 46 U.C.Q.B. 555.

Indictment.—An indictment under sec. 293 (for indecent assault on males) is defective even after verdict if it does not aver that the parties to the offence are males. R. v. Montminy, W.B. (Que.), May, 1893.

CHAPTER THE TWELFTH.

OFFENCES WITH REFERENCE TO MARRIAGE.

SECT. I.—OF BIGAMY.

MARRIAGE as recognised by the law of England is a contract for the voluntary union of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others, until that union is terminated by death (a), or is dissolved or annulled by statute or by the decree of a competent tribunal (b). It is an offence against English law to have a plurality of 'wives' at the same time. The offence is more correctly styled polygamy, but is usually described as bigamy (c). It was originally of ecclesiastical cognisance only, and though it is referred to as a capital crime in the Statute de Bigamis (4 Edw. I. (d)), the jurisdiction of the temporal courts was doubtful until 1603, when the offence was declared felony (1 Jac. I. c. 11). The Act of James I. was in several respects defective. A person whose consort though known to be living had been abroad seven years might have married again, with impunity and so might a person who had been divorced a mensa et thoro. That Act was repealed and re-enacted with amendments in 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 22).

By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 57 (e), 'Whosoever, being married, shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife (ee), whether the second marriage shall have taken place in England or Ireland or elsewhere, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years . . . (f), and any such offence may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in any county or place in England or Ireland where the offender shall be apprehended or be in custody, in the same manner in all respects as if the offence had been actually committed in that county or place.

'Provided that nothing in this section contained shall extend' (1) 'to any second marriage contracted elsewhere than in England and Ireland by any other than a subject of His Majesty,' or (2) 'to any person marrying

(a) See Hyde v. Hyde, L. R. 2 P. & D. 130. Cf. Brinkley v. Att.-Gen., 15 P. D. 76. This definition excludes unions which are subject to the power of the husband or wife to take other wives or husbands while the first is alive. Re Bethell, 38 Ch. D. 220.

(b) Until 1857 a marriage could be dissolved in England only by legislation.

(c) Bigamy, in its proper signification, is said to mean only being twice married, and not having a plurality of wives at once. According to the canonists, bigamy consisted in marrying two virgins successively one after the death of the other; or in once marrying a widow. 4 Bl. Com. 163, note (b). And see Bac. Abr. tit. 'Bigamy,' in the notes.

a second time whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past, and shall not have been known by such persons to be living within that time (g), or shall extend ' (3) ' to any person who, at the time of such second marriage, shall have been divorced from the bond of the first marriage ' (h), or (4) ' to any person whose former marriage shall have been declared void by the sentence of any Court of competent jurisdiction ' (i).

As to the punishment of principals in the second degree and accessories before or after the fact, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94 and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 67, ante, pp. 130 et seq.

Accessories.—Where an indictment charged a woman with bigamy and the man, with whom she contracted the second marriage, with inciting and counselling the woman to commit the offence of bigamy, it was held that if the man knew at the time of the marriage that she was a married woman, and her husband alive, he might be convicted of counselling her to commit the crime of bigamy (j). This indictment did not contain any count charging the man as principal in the second degree; but there is no doubt, where a man marries a woman, knowing such woman to have a husband alive at the time of such marriage, that he is a principal in the second degree, as he is present and aids and assists the woman in committing the felony (k).

Venue.—The effect of the first proviso is to make it an offence within sect. 57, triable in England (or Ireland) for a British subject to contract a bigamous marriage in Scotland (l) or in any other part of the world outside England or Ireland, whether within or without the King's dominions (m).

The effect of the enactment taken with the proviso is that bigamy by British subjects wherever committed is cognisable in England under the section: though in the absence of Imperial legislation the Courts of British possessions are as a general rule unable to try bigamy outside the possession by British subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in the possession (n).

It is immaterial where the first marriage was celebrated if the second was solemnized in England or Ireland: and where the defendant is a British subject it is immaterial where either the first or the second marriage was celebrated, if after the bigamous marriage the offender is arrested in England (or Ireland).

Indictment.—An indictment for bigamy states the first marriage and goes on to charge that ' whilst so married to A. B. ' the prisoner feloniously did intermarry with C. D., 'the said A. B., his former wife, being then alive' (o).

It is not necessary to state more than the name of the second wife (p). In a case decided before 1851, where the second wife was described as a widow but proved to be a spinster, this was held a fatal variance (q). But such a variance is now amendable (r).

On an indictment for bigamy which described the first wife as 'Ann G.,' an examined copy of the certificate (s) of the marriage of the prisoner and 'Sarah Ann G.' was put in, and there was no evidence to explain the difference in the names: Maule, J., directed an acquittal (t).

It is not necessary to state that the prisoner was apprehended or is in custody (u) in the county or place in which he is to be tried (v), nor to negative the second exception (w) nor in a case where the second marriage was contracted elsewhere than in England and Ireland to aver that the prisoner is a British subject (x). Indeed according to the reasoning of R. v. Audley (supra), whatever be the burden of proof it is not necessary to make any express mention on the indictment of any of the four exceptions.

First Marriage.—To support an indictment for bigamy it is necessary to prove that there has been a marriage in fact, that it is valid, i.e. not void ab initio, and subsisting, i.e. not put an end to by the death of one of the spouses, or by divorce a vinculo, nor declared null.

In Fact.—It is not sufficient to prove a first marriage by acknowledgment (y), cohabitation, or habit and repute, or by production of marriage

(o) The words whilst so married to A. B. are superfluous and it is for the defence to set up that the marriage has been annulled or dissolved. See Murray v. R., 7 Q.B. 700. In that case error was brought in 1845 on a judgment given in 1815 on an indictment for bigamy under 35 Geo. III. c. 57, s. 1 (rep.), probably in consequence of a doubt thrown on the validity of the first marriage in R. v. Millis, 10 Cl. & F. 534; 8 E. R. 844. See also R. v. Apley, 1 Cox, 71.

Maule, J., thought that 'evidence might perhaps be offered to explain the circumstance of this difference in the name of the prisoner's first wife, as she is described in the indictment, and as described in the marriage certificate; and even in the absence of such evidence, proof might be supplied that the woman was known by both names.'

(u) The words 'in custody' were not in 1 Jac. I. c. 11.

(v) The offence is triable either where the second marriage was contracted (at common law, 1 Hale, 694; 3 Co. Inst. 87. Starkie, Cr. Pl. 11, and ante, p. 19), or where the accused was apprehended or is in custody (s. 57), and see R. v. Gordon, R. & R. 48. Lord Digby's case, Hutt, 131. The reason given to support the statement in the trial is that it will appear by the caption that the prisoner was in the custody of the sheriff (or gaoler) in the county in which the indictment is found. R. v. Whiley, rightly reported 1 C. & K. 150, erroneously reported 2 Mood. 186. See R. v. Smythies, 1 Den. 498; 2 C. & K. 878. In R. v. Fraser, 1 Mood. 407, the first marriage was laid in Kent, the second in Surrey, the venue was Middlesex, and it was alleged that the prisoner was apprehended without stating any place, and the conviction held bad, but no suggestion was made that the defect was cured by the caption; this case, therefore, may now be considered no authority. See R. v. O'Connor, 5 Q.B. 16, 34. R. v. Treharne, 1 Mood. 298. Where an indictment for bigamy alleged that the prisoner was apprehended in Gloucestershire, and this was not proved; Channell, B., allowed the indictment to be amended by stating that he was in custody in that county. *R. v. articles : and it is essential to give evidence that the marriage was actually solemnised in a manner recognised by the law of the parties, or of the place of celebration (z). Though a lawful canonical marriage need not be proved, yet a marriage in fact, regular or not, must be proved (a), i.e. prima facie evidence must be given of a lawful marriage (b). But a marriage in fact may be sufficiently established by proving that the ceremony took place between the parties without proving the preliminary notices (b), licences (c), banns (d), or consents (e), or residence for the prescribed period (ee), or that the place of solemnisation was one where the ceremony might lawfully be performed or the celebrant a person competent to officiate (f).

It is not quite clear upon the authorities whether, if the first marriage is alleged to have been outside England and Ireland, evidence showing a marriage by habit and repute if valid by the foreign law will suffice on a prosecution in England for bigamy.

In R. v. Wilson (g), upon an indictment for bigamy it was proved on the part of the prisoner that her first husband, before he married her, had been in Canada, and that he was absent for about two years, and when he returned he said he had brought his wife with him, and a lady accompanied him, whom he treated as his wife, and everyone else regarded her in that capacity ; she had been heard of as being alive after the prisoner's first marriage ; and thereupon Crompton, J., interposed, and said that there was evidence of a prior marriage, and, although there might be some technical difficulty in proving the marriage in Canada, still if there was reasonable doubt of the fact, the prisoner ought to be acquitted, and the jury said that it was unnecessary to hear any more evidence (h).

In Truman's case (i) it was held that proof of the prisoner's cohabiting with and acknowledging himself married to a former wife then living, such assertion being backed by his producing to the witness a copy of a proceeding in a Scotch Court against him and his wife for having contracted the marriage irregularly (but nevertheless validly) was sufficient evidence of the first marriage. The point being reserved, all the judges who were present held the conviction proper. Two of them observed that this did not rest upon cohabitation and bare acknowledgment, for the defendant had backed his assertion by the production of the copy of the proceeding ; but some of the judges thought that the acknowledgment alone would have been sufficient, and that the paper produced in evidence was only a confirmation of such acknowledgment. In Upton's case (j), where it was proved that the prisoner being charged with bigamy made a statement before a justice, in which he expressly declared that he had married his first wife, who was then present; Erskine, J., left the case to the jury, observing that this was not an incautious statement made without due attention, but that the prisoner's mind was directed to the very point by the charge made against him.

In R. v. Newton (k), upon an indictment for bigamy it appeared that the prisoner returned from America with a woman described in the indictment as M. C., with whom he lived as his wife for some years afterwards; and that soon after his return he told her sister that he had been married to M. C. at New York by a Presbyterian minister, and he subsequently caused the bellman at Oldham to give public notice, which he did, that no one was to give credit to 'M., the wife of J. N.'; and some time afterwards M. N., describing herself as his wife, complained to a magistrate of his having ill-treated her, and the prisoner attended before the magistrate, and did not deny the alleged marriage, but said he could no longer live with her on account of her jealousy, and consented to allow her eight shillings a week; Wightman, J., after consulting Cresswell, J., told the jury that the question was, whether they were satisfied by the statements made by the prisoner on the various occasions referred to that he had been married to M. C. in America, and that such marriage was a valid one according to the law in force at New York. That declarations lightly or hastily made were entitled to very little weight in such a case; but what the prisoner said deliberately, and when it was obviously his interest to deny marriage, if he did not know it to be a valid one, was undoubtedly evidence entitled to the very serious consideration of the jury.

In R. v. Flaherty (l), the prisoner went to a police-station and said that he wanted to give himself up for bigamy. He stated when and where the first marriage took place, and while in custody signed a statement to that effect. Pollock, C.B., ruled that the statement, though some evidence of a first marriage, was not enough to justify conviction for bigamy.

In R. v. Savage (m), Lush, J., declined to follow R. v. Newton, and held the prisoner's admission that he had married his first wife in Scotland, insufficient to prove the validity of that marriage (n).

In R. v. Lindsay (o), on an indictment for bigamy, the evidence tendered of the former marriage was a certificate of the priest-in-charge of a Roman Catholic church, by whom it was said that the marriage had been solemnised, coupled with identification of the prisoner as one of the parties to the marriage, and proof of a statement made by him when arrested, 'That's all right, but I did not know my former wife was alive,' Walton, J., following R. v. Savage, held this evidence insufficient to prove the first marriage.

Neither party to the former marriage stated in the indictment is a competent witness for the prosecution to prove the marriage or for any purpose (p).

The prisoner was indicted for having married A. W., his first wife, A. A., being alive; the prisoner's first marriage with A. A. was proved. The prisoner's defence was, that the first marriage was void, as A. A. had a husband living at the time, and he proposed to call A. A. to prove that fact; it was objected to her competency that the fact of her marriage with the prisoner having been proved, she must be taken to be his lawful wife. Alderson, B., was at first inclined to think that she might be examined simply to the fact of her being the wife or not of the prisoner; but after conferring with Williams, J., he determined not to receive her evidence, but to reserve the point (q). But where a woman called as a witness against a prisoner, proved on the voire dire (r) that she married the prisoner in 1849, Erle, J., held that she might also prove on the voire dire that she had a sister seven years older than herself, and that they had been brought up together with their parents, and that she always believed that they were sisters, and that her sister had married the prisoner in 1846, and died in 1848; for if a person is questioned on the voire dire with the view to raise an objection to her competency, she may also be examined to remove that prima facie ground of objection (s).

And in R. v. Ayley (t), the alleged first wife was called as a witness

(p) 1 Hale, 693. 1 East, P. C. 469. 1 Hawk. c. 42, s. 8, where a case at the Old Bailey (Feb. 1786) is cited to shew that an affidavit by the first wife to support an application to adjourn the trial was rejected. See R. v. Green, Nov. 18, 1899, Wills, J. Archb. Cr. Pl. (23rd ed.), 1169. Under the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, post, Vol. ii. p. 2271, the defendant and the husband or wife of the defendant are competent witnesses for the defence.

(q) R. v. Peat, 2 Lew. 288. The prisoner was acquitted. The first impression of the learned baron seems to have been correct. The only ground on which the witness could be rejected was, that she was the lawful wife of the prisoner; for 'the general rule does not extend to a wife de facto, but not de jure.' 2 Stark. Evid. 132 (2nd ed.). In Wells v. Fletcher, 5 C. & P. 12, 1 M. & Rob. 99, a woman called for the defendant on examination on the voire dire, said she had been married to the plaintiff, and on re-examination that she was married to another person previously; but not seeing him for thirty years, she thought he was dead, and therefore married the plaintiff, but afterwards found that her first husband was living; and Patteson, J., held that the witness was competent, as the second marriage was a nullity. If R. v. Peat case had been an indictment for larceny, and the witness called for the prisoner had proved her marriage to him on the voire dire, Wells v.

Fletcher shews that she might have been rendered competent by proving her previous marriage, and it is difficult to see how proof by other evidence that she had married the prisoner, whether such evidence was given before or after she was called, could render her incompetent; for her evidence would not be inconsistent with such evidence, as it would admit the marriage with the prisoner, but shew that it was void. R. v. Bathwick, 2 B. & Ad. 639, shews that the competency of the wife does not depend upon the marshalling of the evidence, or the particular stage of the case in which she may be called; if, therefore, in Peat's case the witness had been called before her marriage with the prisoner had been proved and she would have been competent to prove her previous marriage, it is difficult to see how her marriage with the prisoner having been proved before she was called could render her incompetent, and it certainly would operate hardly on a prisoner, if such were the case, for the prosecutor might in the course of his case prove the marriage of the witness with the prisoner, and the prisoner might have no one except the witness to prove the former marriage. It may be added that Lord Hale says that a second wife is not so much as a wife de facto. C. S. G.

after production of a certificate of her previous marriage to another man and his death before her marriage to the prisoner.

The woman with whom the prisoner is alleged to have feloniously intermarried is a competent witness so soon as the former marriage is established.

It has not been thought necessary to set forth in detail, as in former editions, the numerous statutes regulating the celebration of marriages (u) or validating marriages not celebrated according to law (v).

The only grounds on which a marriage solemnised in England can be treated as invalid are :—

(1) That it was solemnised in a place not licensed nor authorised nor registered.

(2) That it was solemnised by or before a person not having authority to officiate at the marriage in question, whether civil or religious.

(3) That some necessary condition was deliberately not observed.

(4) That the parties were incapable of marriage, e.g. by reason of nonage or lunacy.

(5) That the parties could not lawfully intermarry because of consanguinity or affinity or because one or both of them was already in vinculo matrimonii.

Where the marriage took place outside England the evidence must go to shew that the marriage was solemnised in a form recognised as constituting a valid marriage by the laws of the country under whose forms the marriage was celebrated : i.e. a marriage in the sense of English law (w).

The common law requisite in point of form for a valid marriage in England is celebration in facie ecclesie, i.e. by an episcopally ordained minister (x). Owing to the provisions of the Marriage Acts, 1823–1898, proof of a common-law marriage in England is not sufficient for the purposes of an indictment for bigamy. But when the marriage is at sea (y) or within the British lines by a chaplain or officer or other person officiating under marriage per verba de presenti or per verba de futuro was abolished in 1754 (20 Geo. III. c. 33, s. 13, re-enacted in 1823 as 4 Geo. IV. c. 76, s. 27). In Lyon's case, Old Bailey (1738, 1 East, P. C. 469, citing Serjeant Foster's MS.), Willes, C.J., seems to have been of opinion that a marriage in England by a priest of the Church of Rome was good if the ceremony of that Church in the words of the contracting party could be proved. East seeks to limit this to persons of the Roman allegiance. See R. v. Millis, ubi supra. Sussex Peerage Claim, 6 St. Tr. (N. S.) 79. Under the present Marriage Acts such a marriage in England is not valid unless celebrated under the statutory conditions.

(v) Such of the numerous confirmation and validation Acts as are printed as public general Acts are enumerated in Appendix VII. to the Official Index to the Statutes. Those which are local and personal are enumerated in the Index to Local and Personal Acts, 1801–1899. By the Provisional Order Marriages Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII. c. 23), power is given to a Secretary of State by provisional order, to be confirmed by Parliament, to remove the invalidity of or doubts as to marriages in England which are invalid or doubtful by reason of some informality.

the orders of the commanding officer of a British army serving abroad (z) or where no local authority can celebrate a valid marriage a common-law marriage between British subjects seems to be regarded as valid (a).

Under the existing law a marriage may be solemnised in England without a religious ceremony, or with the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England or of any other religious body, and every marriage solemnized under the Marriage Acts, 1836, 1837, 1840, and 1856, is good and cognizable in like manner as a marriage before the passing of the Act of 1836 according to the rules of the Church of England (b).

Form.—All the statutes regulating the celebration of a marriage in England require that the ceremony shall take place in the presence of two or more credible witnesses besides the officiating clergyman (c) or authorised person in whose presence the marriage is celebrated (d) or the civil registrar (e) or marriage officer by or in whose presence it is celebrated (f). In the case of marriages before a civil registrar or in a registered building (not of the Church of England) whether in the presence of an authorised person or of the civil registrar, the marriage must be celebrated with open doors (g). They also require that the marriage shall be registered in duplicate in the register provided by the Registrar-General for the purpose and authorise the clergyman, &c., to ask the parties as to the particulars required to be registered (h).

Each entry shall be signed by the parties and the clergyman (h) or authorised person (i) or registering officer (j) and attested by two witnesses. The statutes do not say, but certainly mean, that the witnesses signing should be witnesses of the marriage and not merely of the filling-in of the register, and the scheduled form of registry makes this clear.

Presumption in Favour of Validity.—In Catterall v. Sweetman (k), Dr. Lushington said: ‘Viewing the successive Marriage Acts it appears that prohibitive words without a declaration of nullity were not considered by the legislature as creating a nullity: and this is a legislative interpretation of Acts relating to marriage. And not only is all legal presumption in favour of the validity and against the nullity of a marriage, but it is so on this principle: a legislative enactment to annul a marriage de facto is a penal enactment, and not only penal to the parties but highly penal to innocent offspring, and therefore to be construed according to the acknowledged rule most strictly' (l).

As a general rule production of the certificate of the marriage in the proper form is sufficient prima facie evidence of the validity in point of form of the marriage, without proof of the status of the officiating minister, of the licensing (m) or registration (n) or official character of the building, and of compliance with other statutory requirements (o), such as publication of banns (p), or celebration with open doors (q).

Place.—A marriage to be valid must be celebrated—

(i) in a church or chapel of the Church of England, licensed by the proper ecclesiastical authority for the solemnisation of marriages (r) ;

(ii) at the office and in the presence of the superintendent registrar of the district (s) ; or

(iii) in a building certified according to law as a place of religious worship (not of the Established Church) and registered for solemnising marriages and specified in the notice of the marriage in question (t).

These rules as to place do not apply to marriages by special licence of the Archbishop of Canterbury or by the usages of the Society of Friends or the practice of the Jewish religion.

In the following cases marriages are declared void for non-compliance with the directions of the Marriage Acts :—

(i.) Church of England.—By the Marriage Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 76), sect. 22, ' If any persons shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry in any other place than a church, or such public chapel wherein banns may be lawfully published, unless by special licence as aforesaid (i.e. of the Archbishop of Canterbury) or shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry without due publication of banns, or licence from a person or persons having authority to grant the same first had and obtained, or shall knowingly and wilfully consent to or acquiesce in the solemnization of such marriage by any person not being in holy orders, the marriages of such persons shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever ' (u).

(ii. & iii.) General.—By sect. 42 of the Marriage Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 85), ' If any person shall knowingly and wilfully (v) intermarry ' (after March 1, 1837) ' under the provisions of this Act in any place other

In a case where the parties were misdescribed it was ruled on an indictment for bigamy that the prosecution to establish the validity of the marriage must shew that one of the parties was unaware of the misdescription. *R. v. than the church, chapel, registered building, or office or other place specified in the notice and certificate aforesaid, or without due notice (w) to the superintendent registrar or without certificate of notice duly issued, or without licence in case a licence is necessary under this Act, or in the absence of a registrar or superintendent registrar where the presence of a registrar or superintendent registrar is necessary under this Act (x), the marriage of such persons except in any case hereinafter mentioned shall be null and void: Provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend to annul any marriage legally solemnized according to the provisions of the Marriage Act, 1823' (4 Geo. IV. c. 76).

It has been held that where a marriage notice was given under the Marriage Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 119), which was false to the knowledge of both parties, as to the name of the woman and in other respects, the marriage was nevertheless valid (y).

Person Celebrating.—A person competent to officiate at a marriage cannot lawfully solemnise a marriage between himself and another person without the presence of another person authorised to celebrate marriages (z).

No one but a clergyman in holy orders of the Church of England can validly celebrate a marriage in a church or chapel of the Church of England or under the special licence of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The presence of a superintendent registrar and of a registrar of the district is essential for a purely civil marriage (6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 85, s. 20).

The presence of an authorised person is essential at a marriage in a registered non-Anglican place of worship (a) unless the civil registrar is present (61 & 62 Vict. c. 58, ss. 7, 15).

In the case of marriages under the Foreign Marriage Act, 1892, a marriage officer must be present and may solemnise (55 & 56 Vict. c. 23, s. 8).

Banns—False Name.—It seems that the assuming a fictitious name upon the second marriage will not prevent the offence from being complete (b). And it was decided to be no ground of defence, that upon the second marriage (which was by banns) the parties passed by false Christian names when the banns were published, and when the marriage took place; and it was further held that the prisoner, having written down the names for the publication of the banns, was precluded thereby from saying that the woman was not known by the name he delivered in, and that she was not rightly described by that name in the indictment. The indictment was against the prisoner for marrying Anna T. whilst he had a wife living: the second marriage was by banns; and, it appeared (w) Holmes v. Simmons [1868], L. R. 1 P. D. & A. 523. In Beavan v. McMahon [1861], 2 Sw. & Tr. 230 (licence), the man had deliberately suppressed one of the Christian names of the woman. It was held that the name given, Margaret Beavan, might represent the woman, and that as the licence was issued for competent authority the marriage was valid.

(x) Sect. 42 is repealed in respect of marriages authorised by and solemnised in accordance with the Marriage Act, 1898, by a person authorised under that Act, in the absence of the registrar (61 & 62 Vict. c. 58, s. 15).

(a) This does not apply to Jewish or Quaker marriages.

(b) R. v. Allison, post, p. 992. And see R. v. Allen, post, p. 1009, and the question as to the second marriage there discussed.

that the prisoner wrote the note for the publication of the banns, in which the woman was called Anna, and that she was married by that name, but that her real name was Susannah. Upon a case reserved two questions were made : one, whether this marriage was not void, because there was no publication of banns by the woman's right name, and that, if the second marriage were void, it created no offence : and the other question was, whether the charge of the prisoner's marrying Anna was proved. But the judges held, unanimously, that the second marriage was sufficient to constitute the offence ; and that, after having called the woman ' Anna ' in the note he gave in for the publication of banns, it did not lie in the prisoner's mouth to say that she was not known as well by the name of Anna as by that of Susannah, or that she was not rightly called by the name of Anna in the indictment (c).

So where the prisoner contracted the second marriage in the maiden name of his mother, and the woman he married had also made use of her mother's maiden name, it was unanimously resolved by all the judges that the prisoner was rightly convicted (d).

So where the second wife had never gone or been known by the name of Thick, but had assumed it when the banns were published, that her neighbours might not know she was the person intended, it was held that the parties could not be allowed to evade the punishment for their offence, by contracting a concertedly invalid marriage (e).

In Mayhew v. Mayhew (f), where S. White, spinster, was married by banns as S. Kelso, widow, the marriage was held good though both parties were aware of the misdescription.

Misdescription of the parties in a notice for marriage before a registrar, though it renders the parties liable to penalties does not render the marriage void (g).

Notices.—The prisoner was married a second time before the registrar, describing himself as Benjamin Rea, his true name being Edward Rea. There was no evidence to shew the wife knew of this, and the man was held to be rightly convicted of bigamy, as the effect of the Marriage Act, 1836, ss. 4, 42, is to render invalid a marriage where both parties, and not one only, knowingly intermarry without due notice (h).

Licences.—A marriage celebrated under a licence, in which one of the parties is described by a name wholly different from his own, is not therefore void. G. R. was taken into custody as the reputed father of a child, of which a woman was pregnant, and married her by licence. He gave his name as G. N. at the times of the apprehension and marriage, and was named so in the licence, but had never gone by that name before ; and the Court of Queen's Bench held this marriage valid (i).

(i) Lane v. Goodwin, 4 Q. B. 361. But if a licence were obtained for one person with the intention that it should be used for another, such a licence might not be valid. Patteson, J. Ibid.

Where a marriage was solemnised by licence, in which the woman's name was Margaret B.; her baptismal name and that by which she was commonly called being 'Margaret Lea B.'; the licence was obtained in the altered name by the man, who knowingly, and by direction of the woman, suppressed the name of 'Lea,' and gave false places of residence in order that the surrogate might not know who the woman was, and that the intended marriage might be kept secret from her friends; it was held that the question was whether the woman was married without a 'licence from a person or persons having authority to grant the same.' There was no doubt the person who granted the licence had authority to grant it, and it came therefore to the question whether this was a licence for the woman. It was clear that an altered name might represent a person; therefore the name 'Margaret B.' might represent her, and as the licence was obtained for her and by her direction from a person who had authority to grant it the marriage was not void (ii).

Publication of Banns.—The Marriage Acts do not specify what must be observed in the publication of banns, or that the banns shall be published in the true names of the parties; but it must be understood as the clear intention of the legislature that the banns shall be published in the true names, because it requires that notice in writing shall be delivered to the minister of the true Christian names and surnames of the parties seven days before the publication; and, unless such notice be given, he is not obliged to publish the banns. But a publication in the name which the party has assumed, and by which he is known in the parish, appears to be sufficient, and would, indeed, be the proper publication where the party is not known by his real name. Thus, where a person, whose baptismal and surname was A. L., was married by banns by the name of G. S., having been known in the parish where he resided and was married by that name only from his first coming into the parish till his marriage, which was about three years, the marriage was held valid (j). And a marriage by licence, not in the party's real name, but in the name which he had assumed, because he had deserted, he being known by that name only in the place where he lodged and was married, and where he had resided sixteen weeks, was also held valid. Ellenborough, C.J., said, 'If this name had been assumed for the purpose of fraud in order to enable the party to contract marriage, and to conceal himself from the party to whom he was about to be married, that would have been a fraud on the Marriage Act and the rights of marriage, and the Court would not have given effect to any such corrupt purpose. But where a name has been previously assumed, so as to have become the name which the party has acquired by reputation, that is, within the meaning of the Marriage Act, the party's true name' (k).

In order to invalidate a marriage under sect. 22 of the Marriage Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 76) (l), it must be contracted with a knowledge by (ii) Beavan v. M'Mahon, 30 L. J. Mat. 61: 1 Sw. & Tr. 230.

(j) R. v. Billingham, 3 M. & S. 250.

(k) R. v. Burton-upon-Trent, 3 M. & S. 537.

(l) Under Lord Hardwicke's Act, 26 Geo. II. c. 33 (rep.), the marriage was void if the names were completely misdescribed, whether from accident or design: R. v. Tibshelt, 1 B. & Ad. 190, but if there were only a partial variation of name, as the alteration of a letter or letters, or the addition or suppression of one Christian name, or the names had been such as the both parties that no due publication of the banns has taken place. Where, therefore, J. C. told S. S. that he would see the banns properly published, and she took no steps in the matter, and he told her that they had been published, but procured the banns to be published in the name of A. W., which name she had never borne; and in performing the service the clergyman applied to her the name of A. till which time she believed she was about to be married by her own name, and she did not know, until after the marriage, that the banns had been published in a wrong name; it was held that the marriage was valid (m). But where both the man and the woman were aware that the banns had been published in a manner to conceal the identity of one of them, it was held that the marriage was void (n).

E. C. T., a minor, of the age of seventeen years, and M. A. A., a widow, of the age of thirty-five years, were married in 1833 by banns, which were published in the names of E. T., bachelor, and M. A. A., spinster; the entry in the register was in the same names and descriptions, and was signed E. T. The marriage was clandestine and without the knowledge or consent of the parents of T., who was baptised by the names of E. C. T., and though known to some persons by the name of C. T. or T. only, was never known by the name of E. T. It was admitted that the woman was cognizant of the fraud and intended it; and it was held that as the entry in the register was, E. T. and M. A. A. were married by banns, it was impossible for him not to have known of the publication of the banns; and the signature of only one of his Christian names showed that he must have known that the banns had been published in that name only; and, therefore, he, with the woman, knowingly and wilfully intermarried without due publication of banns (o).

One W. was baptised and had always been known by the name of Bower W., and never by the name of John W. His banns were published in the name of John W.; after the first publication the wife told W. that the name John W. was wrong. He said it was one of his names, though he had never been called by it; she asked him why he used the name John? He said it was for fear any of his relations should know of his marrying her. She wished him to use the name of Bower; he said he should be disinherited if he did; she asked him if the marriage would be legal under the name of John; he said it would. It was a long time before she would consent to being married to him in the name of John. She did so because he said if she loved him she would marry him parties had used, and been known by, at one time, and not at another; in such cases the publication might or might not be void; the supposed misdescription might be explained, and it became a most important part of the inquiry, whether it was consistent with honesty of purpose, or arose from a fraudulent intention. *R. v. (o) Tongue v. Tongue, 1 Moore, P. C. 90. There was also evidence that it was the regular course to make the parties examine the entry in the banns book before a marriage, and see that their names and descriptions were right, and the witness added that she should not have been present at the marriage as a witness, unless the banns had been regularly published.

in that name, and would trust to him afterwards. Ultimately, they were married in the names of M. M. and John W. Cresswell, J., held that there was not a due publication of banns, as W. was described in them as John W., and both parties were aware of this misdescription when the marriage was solemnised, and therefore the marriage was invalid (p).

On the trial of an ejectment, a marriage was said to have taken place in 1784, at a private house under a special licence from the Archbishop of Canterbury. The plaintiff's counsel offered in evidence an affidavit made for the purpose of obtaining a special licence to be married at a private house, and a fiat signed by the Archbishop, directing a licence to be made out, as prayed, for a marriage between the parties; both which documents were produced from the Office of Faculties, the proper ecclesiastical office. No search had been made for the original licence, and there was proof that such licences were not kept in any regular custody, but were generally handed over to the officiating clergyman and not taken back from him. A copy of the register of the parish of St. Pancras, which stated the marriage to have been at a private house, by special licence, and professed to be signed by the parties, was also offered in evidence. Objection was taken to the fiat as being secondary evidence of the contents of the licence, for which no search had been made; but the evidence was admitted; but the Court held that it was properly received, as the fiat was an act done in the course of official duty, shewing that two persons bearing the names of the lessor of the plaintiff's parents were at that time engaged in taking measures for contracting a marriage; and that it might properly be taken into consideration by the jury as confirming the evidence of their union, which arose from cohabitation and reception. The affidavit and register were proofs of the same general fact (q).

Registration is not essential to the validity of a marriage in England (r). It is usual but not essential to prove the first marriage by a certified copy of the entry of the marriage in the register (s): or the original register may be produced from the proper custody (t). If the register or a certified copy of the entry is not available viva voce evidence of persons present at the ceremony will suffice if they can describe it sufficiently to shew that it was in a lawful form.

Identity.—The identity of the parties to the first marriage must also be proved (u). It is not necessary for this purpose to call any of the witnesses

(p) Midgley v. Wood, 30 L. J. Mat. 57. But see Re Rutter [1907], 2 Ch. 592.

(r) R. v. Allison, MS. Bayley, J., and R. & R. 109. The prisoner was indicted for marrying Ann Epton, while Jane, his former wife was living. . . . Each marriage was proved by a witness present at the ceremony. It appeared that at the first marriage the prisoner went by the name of Allison, at the second by the name of Wilkinson. Chambré, J., doubted whether the evidence was sufficient without proof of the banns, but the other judges held that it was. Cf. R. v. Manwaring, 26 L. J. M. C. 10; D. v. B. 132.

who are by law required to sign the register (v), but is sufficient to give any evidence as to the identity of the parties, e.g. by having their handwriting to the register or that bellringers were paid by them for the wedding or the like.

In R. v. Tolson (w), on an indictment for bigamy a photograph which had been taken from the prisoner, and which she had said was that of her husband, was allowed to be shewn to a witness present at the first marriage, and also to another witness who had known the man of whom the photograph was a likeness, in order to prove his identity with the person mentioned in the marriage certificate. But this form of identification is unreliable unless amply corroborated (x).

Evidence.—Where the entry of a marriage in England is in a non-parochial register or record it can be proved on an indictment for bigamy or other criminal case only by production from Somerset House of the original register or record (y).

The marriage registers are kept in duplicate and the entry of the marriage is made therein immediately after its solemnisation, and is signed by the parties and by two witnesses and by the officiating clergyman (z) or minister or authorised person (a) or registrar if he officiates or attends (b), or in the case of marriages abroad the marriage officer (c).

Where the entry is in a register kept under the provisions of the Registration Acts:—

(a) a certified copy of the entry purporting to be sealed or stamped with the seal of the general register office is to be received as evidence of the marriage to which the entry relates without any further or other proof of such entry (d): or

(b) an examined copy or extract of the entry signed and certified as a true copy or extract by the officer to whose custody the original is entrusted is admissible in evidence (e): but

(c) a certificate which is not a certified copy of the register is not so admissible (f).

Although marriages must be solemnised in the presence of two or more credible witnesses (g) it is not essential to call all or any of them (gg).

By the Marriage Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 76), s. 26, 'After the solemnization of any marriage under a publication of banns, it shall not be necessary in support of such marriage to give any proof of the actual dwelling of the parties in the respective parishes or chapelries wherein the banns of matrimony were published; or, where the marriage is by licence, it shall not be necessary to give any proof that the usual place of abode of one of the parties, for the space of fifteen days as aforesaid, was in the parish or chapelry where the marriage was solemnized; nor shall any evidence in either of the said cases be received to prove the contrary, in any suit touching the validity of such marriage' (h).

By the Marriage and Registration Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 119), sect. 17, 'After any marriage shall have been solemnized, under the authority of any of the said recited Acts (i), or of this Act, it shall not be necessary in support of such marriage to give any proof of the actual dwelling or of the period of dwelling of either of the parties previous to the marriage within the district stated in any notice of marriage to be that of his or her residence, or of the consent to any marriage having been given by any person whose consent thereto is required by law, or that the registered building in which any marriage may have been solemnized had been certified according to law as a place of religious worship (j) or that such building was the usual place of worship of either of the parties, nor shall any evidence be given to prove the contrary in any suit or legal proceedings touching the validity of such marriage; and all marriages which heretofore have been or which hereafter may be had or solemnized under the authority of any of the said recited Acts or of this Act, in any building or place of worship which has been registered pursuant to the provisions of the Marriage Act, 1836 (k), but which may not have been certified as required by law, shall be as valid in all respects as if such place of worship had been so certified' (l).

By sect. 23, 'Every marriage solemnized under any of the said recited Acts or of this Act shall be good and cognizable in like manner as marriages before the passing of the first-recited Act (m) according to the rites of the Church of England.'

Capacity.—The Marriage Acts, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 76) and 1836 (6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 85), apply only to the mode of celebrating marriage and do not deal with capacity to marry (n).

The capacity of the parties to marry depends in the main on the law of their domicile at the date of the marriage (o). According to English law the consents of parents and guardians (oo) are part of the form of marriage, and are not regarded as limiting the capacity to marry (p). Consequently (h) Upon an enactment nearly similar, it was determined, in a prosecution for bigamy, where the first marriage was proved to have been by banns, that it was no objection that the parties did not reside in the parish where the banns were published and the marriage was celebrated. The provision of the statute was considered as an express answer to the objection; and it appears not to have been adverted to when the point was received for the opinion of the judges. *R. v. (p) False statements as to having obtained such consents are punishable (post, a marriage of foreigners in England without the consents required by their national law or the law of their domicile is regarded as valid (g).

Prohibitions under foreign laws as to the marriage of persons under religious vows or of negroes appear not to affect the capacity of such persons to marry in England (r). But in the case of marriage under a foreign law it would seem to be necessary to prove any consents required by that law to establish the validity in point of form of the marriage.

Nonage.—By the law of England and Ireland males are capable of marrying at fourteen and females at twelve (s). Between these ages and twenty-one, persons of either sex may marry with the consent of parents or guardians if they have any (t).

Insanity.—Insanity in either party at the date of the marriage renders it absolutely void if the party was then a lunatic so found by commission (u), but voidable only, if the party had not then been found a lunatic, but was at the date of the marriage so unsound of mind as to be incapable of understanding and consenting (v). In the case of marriage the validity depends on the sanity of the party at the date of the ceremony and not whether the same party knows of the insanity of the other party (w).

Impotence.—Impotence of either party at the time of celebration makes the marriage voidable, but not void ab initio (x).

Impediments.—The impediment to marriage between persons who are capable of marrying which are recognised by English law are:—

(i.) the existence of a valid subsisting monogamous marriage of either party. (Vide ante, p. 979).

(ii.) consanguinity or affinity between the parties within certain degrees.

For persons domiciled in England at the date of the marriage, wherever it is celebrated (y) these degrees are determined by the Table of Consanguinity and Affinity (z) published in 1563 as an authoritative exposition of the Acts 28 Hen. VIII. c. 7, s. 7; 28 Hen. VIII. c. 16, s. 2; 32 Hen. VIII. c. 38 (a). For persons domiciled elsewhere the prohibited degrees depend on the law of the nationality or the domicile of the parties (b).

By the Marriage Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 54), sect. 2, 'all marriages celebrated after August 31, 1835, between persons within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity shall be absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever' (c). Where, consequently, a marriage takes place within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity, as such marriage is wholly void, a second marriage will not amount to the crime of bigamy. Where, therefore, on an indictment for bigamy, it appeared that the prisoner had married two sisters, one after the death of the other, and the latter marriage was alleged in the indictment as the legal marriage, it was held that he was entitled to be acquitted, as that marriage was null and void to all intents and purposes (d). The Act of 1835 extends to the illegitimate as well as the legitimate child of a late wife's parents. Therefore a marriage with the illegitimate sister of a deceased wife was held void (e). So a marriage of a man with the daughter of the illegitimate half-sister of his deceased wife is void (f).

The table of prohibited degrees was varied by 7 Edw. VII. c. 47, for the purposes of marriage as a civil contract by legalising marriages between a man and the sister of his deceased, but not of his divorced, wife. The Act validates as civil contracts in the United Kingdom marriages already contracted with a deceased wife's sister solemnised in the United Kingdom, or in a foreign state or British possession where such marriage could lawfully be contracted (g).

On an indictment for bigamy, it appeared that the first marriage professed to be under the provisions of the Marriage Act, 1836, and the superintendent registrar produced the register returned to him by the registrar, who proved that he was present at the marriage, that it was registered, that the parties signed their names, and he witnessed it; and the superintendent registrar produced the register of the place where the marriage was celebrated, and the certificate he issued was produced and proved by him. A witness stated that he was present at the marriage, and that notice of it was duly given to the superintendent registrar, but the latter did not produce it, and said, if he had received it, he had left it at home; it was contended, on behalf of the prisoner, that it was incumbent on the prosecution to shew that the first marriage was celebrated in the registered building specified in the notice and certificate, to prove that due notice had been given to the superintendent registrar, and that the certificate of the notice had been duly issued. But, on a case reserved, all the judges present held the evidence sufficient (h).

Upon an indictment for bigamy, which alleged that the prisoner married E. G. in a Wesleyan chapel duly registered for solemnising marriages (i), and afterwards in her lifetime married E. O., a witness proved that he was present at the first marriage at the Wesleyan chapel in the presence of the registrar, and signed the register as a witness, and that the parties lived together as man and wife for two or three years. A witness proved that a certificate of this marriage was examined by him with the register book, kept at the office of the superintendent registrar of the district, and that it was correct, and that it was signed by the superintendent registrar. This certificate contained a copy of the register which the registrar certified to be correct. The witness also proved that he examined another certificate with the register book at the office of the superintendent registrar, and that it was correctly extracted, and was signed by the superintendent registrar in his presence (j). The witness also proved that another document was signed in his presence by the superintendent registrar, and that he examined it with the register at his office, and found it was correctly extracted (k). The reception of these documents was objected to, on the ground that certificates were not admissible to prove a marriage in a Wesleyan chapel, or that it was a place in which a marriage could be legally solemnised, or that, if admissible, they must be authenticated by the official seal of the registrar, and not under hand only. But the documents were admitted, and the prisoner convicted; and it was held that the conviction was right, upon the ground that, independently of the two last-mentioned documents, there was prima facie evidence that the chapel was duly registered, and was therefore a place in which marriages might be legally solemnised. The presence of the registrar at the marriage, the fact of the ceremony taking place, and the entry in the registrar's book, aided, as they were, by the presumption omnia rite esse acta, afforded prima facie evidence that the chapel was a duly registered place, in which marriages might be legally celebrated (l). So where on an indictment for bigamy the prisoner was shewn to have been secondly married at a Wesleyan chapel not registered under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 36, and this marriage was proved by the registrar, who produced the certificate; it was objected that there was no proof of the second marriage, or that it was invalid, having taken place in a chapel; but Wightman, J., overruled the objections (m).

Willes, J., said: 'It is a mistake to suppose that the provisions of

In Sichel v. Lambert (n), in an action for goods sold there was a plea of coverture, and the defendant stated that she was married to J. L. at a Roman Catholic chapel; that she and L. were both Roman Catholics, and were married by a priest in the way in which Roman Catholic marriages are ordinarily celebrated, and that they lived together for some years, and she produced a certificate of the marriage from the priest who performed the ceremony, and a certificate shewing that the civil contract of marriage had been performed before the French Consul; but there was no proof that the person who performed the ceremony was a priest, or that the chapel was a place licensed for marriages, or that the registrar was present at the time. The Court of Common Pleas held that it might be presumed that the chapel was licensed and the registrar present as well because sect. 39 of the Marriage Act, 1836, declares any person who wilfully solemnises a marriage in any other place than a registered building or in the absence of the registrar, guilty of felony, as because the ordinary rule omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta ought to prevail in such a case. In R. v. Cresswell (o), where a marriage was solemnised in a building in a parish situate a few yards from the parish church, at a time when the parish church was disused in consequence of its undergoing repairs, and after divine service had been several times performed in such building, it was presumed in favour of the marriage to have been duly licensed, although no proof was given of a licence by the bishop. Coleridge, C.J., said: 'We are of opinion that the marriage service having been performed in the place where divine service was several times performed, the rule "omnia præsumuntur rite acta" applies, and that we must assume that the place was properly licensed, and that the clergyman performing the service was not guilty of the grave offence of marrying persons in an unlicensed place. The facts of the marriage and other church services being performed there by a clergyman are abundant evidence from which the Court and a jury might assume that the place was properly licensed for the celebration of marriages' (p).

In R. v. Cradock (q), proof of marriage in a chapel in the presence of the registrar of the district and two witnesses was held to raise a prima facie presumption that the chapel was registered for the celebration of marriages.

the Society of Friends (r) or the Jewish religion (s) on production of a certificate or licence of the civil registrar and without his attendance (t). The place where the marriage is celebrated need not be in a district in which the parties or either of them dwell (u). The statutes do not specify the number of witnesses necessary at these marriages but require registration of the marriage and signature of the register by two witnesses and the secretary of the synagogue or registering officer of the Quakers (v).

Such marriages are ordinarily proved by the production of a certificate, i.e. certified copy of the register, and by identification of the parties (w). But in the case of a marriage by Jewish rules it is said to be necessary also to prove (1) a contract of marriage (x); (2) that the witnesses to the marriage were not blood relations of the parties (y).

Marriages may be validly celebrated by Quakers or Jews before the civil registrar and in accordance with the statutory conditions required in such case (z), and it would seem that marriages by Jewish rules of Jews domiciled in England but within the English prohibited degrees are not valid in England (a).

Marriages by English Forms Outside the United Kingdom.—‘All marriages solemnized within the British lines by any chaplain or officer or other person officiating under the orders of the commanding officer of a British army serving abroad shall be as valid in law as if the same had been solemnized within the United Kingdom with a due observance of all forms required by law’ (b).

Where a soldier on service with the British army in St. Domingo, in 1796, went with a woman to a chapel in the town, and the ceremony was there performed by a person appearing and officiating as a priest; the service being in French, but interpreted into English by a person who officiated as clerk, and understood at the time by the woman to be the marriage service of the Church of England. This was held sufficient evidence, after eleven years’ cohabitation, that the marriage was properly celebrated, although the woman stated that she did not know that the person officiating was a priest. Ellenborough, C.J., in delivering his opinion, considered the case, first, as a marriage celebrated in a place where the law of England prevailed (supposing, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the law of England, ecclesiastical and civil, was recognised by subjects of England in a place occupied by the King's troops, who would impliedly carry that law with them) and held that it would be a good marriage by that law: for it would have been a good marriage in this country before the Marriage Act, and consequently would be so now in a foreign colony, to which that Act does not extend. In the second place, he considered it upon the supposition that the law of England had not been carried to St. Domingo by the King's forces, nor was obligatory upon them in this particular; and held that the facts stated would be evidence of a good marriage according to the laws of that country, whatever it might be; and that upon such facts every presumption was to be made in favour of the validity of the marriage (c).

On the authority of R. v. Millis (d) it was held that a marriage solemnised at the consulate office at Beyrout in Syria, according to the rites of the Church of England, between two British subjects who were members of that church, by an American missionary, who was not in holy orders, was void (dd).

R. v. Millis (d) does not decide that marriages of British subjects in the colonies, or on board ship or elsewhere, where a clergyman cannot be obtained, are invalid (e). This was expressly declared in Beamish v. Beamish (f), and in a case in India where no clergyman could be obtained, it was held that R. v. Millis did not apply (g).

The Foreign Marriage Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 23) (h), which deals with the marriage of British subjects outside the United Kingdom by British marriage officers, provides by sect. 23 that 'nothing in this Act shall confirm or impair or in anywise affect the validity in law of any marriage solemnized beyond the seas otherwise than as herein provided, and the Act shall not extend to the marriage of any of the Royal family.'

such repeal or any defect in the authority of the consul or the solemnization of the marriage elsewhere than at the consulate, be as valid as if the said Act had not been repealed, and the marriage had been solemnized at the consulate by or before a duly authorised consul ;

‘ Provided that this enactment shall not render valid any marriage declared invalid before the passing of this Act by any competent Court, or render valid any marriage either of the parties to which has before the passing of this Act, lawfully intermarried with any other person.’

Colonial Marriages.—By 28 & 29 Vict. c. 64, after reciting that laws ‘ have from time to time been made by the legislature of divers of her Majesty’s possessions abroad for the purpose of establishing the validity of certain marriages previously contracted therein, but doubts are entertained whether such laws are in all respects effectual for the aforesaid purpose beyond the limits of such possessions,’ it is enacted as follows :—

Sect. 1. ‘ Every law made or to be made by the legislature of any such possession as aforesaid, for the purpose of establishing the validity of any marriage or marriages contracted in such possession, shall have and be deemed to have had from the date of the making of such law, the same force and effect, for the purpose aforesaid, within all parts of her Majesty’s dominions, as such law may have had, or may hereafter have, within the possession for which the same was made : Provided that nothing in this law contained shall give any effect or validity to any marriage, unless at the time of such marriage both of the parties thereto were, according to the law of England (ii), competent to contract the same.’

Sect. 2. ‘ In this Act the word “ legislature ” shall include any authority competent to make laws for any of her Majesty’s possessions abroad, except the Parliament of the United Kingdom and her Majesty in Council’ (see also 6 Edw. VII. c. 30 : 7 Edw. VII. c. 47).

Marriages under other Laws than English.—Where the first marriage was contracted outside England and not under English law, evidence must be given to prove that the marriage was in form and substance valid by the law of the country where it was contracted, and where the second marriage was contracted outside England it is necessary to shew that it was in point of fact valid by the law under which it was celebrated. The laws of other countries being matters of fact must be proved by evidence of experts conversant with that law (j) periti virtute officii or virtute professionis, such as a lawyer practising in the courts of the country whose law is in question, or a person having from professional research or experience a sufficient qualification (k).

This rule as to proof of non-English law of marriage applies to Scots, Irish, and colonial law as well as to the law of foreign states, and these laws being matters of fact it is impossible here to deal with them in detail.

Scotland.—The law of Scotland recognises irregular marriages as valid where satisfied that the parties meant to contract marriage (l).

By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 96, s. 1, 'After the 31st of December, 1856, no irregular marriage contracted in Scotland by declaration, acknowledgment, or ceremony, shall be valid, unless one of the parties had at the date thereof his or her usual place of residence there, or had lived in Scotland for twenty-one days next preceding such marriage; any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding' (m).

Where it appeared that the second marriage took place at Gretna Green, and upon the whole evidence the assent of the second wife was not 'distinctly and clearly proved,' and, though the parties had lived together afterwards, the evidence tended rather to shew that they were living together in a state of concubinage, inasmuch as the prisoner still continued to address her by her maiden name, Alderson, B., directed the jury to find the prisoner not guilty (n). And where on an indictment for bigamy, to prove the second marriage in Scotland, a witness stated that she (being the sister of the second wife) was present at a ceremony performed by a minister of a congregation, but whether of the Kirk she did not know, in her private house in Edinburgh; that she herself was married in the same way, and that parties were always married in Scotland in private houses; that the prisoner and her sister lived together in her house as man and wife for a few days after the ceremony; and the jury found the prisoner guilty; upon the question being reserved whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict, it was held that, even supposing that the witness had been a competent witness for such a matter, her evidence did not prove a marriage in fact (o).

Ireland.—The rules as to prohibited degrees of consanguinity and affinity are the same in Ireland as in England (p), and marriages within these degrees are absolutely void (q) except in cases within 7 Edw. VII. c. 47 (r).

It would seem that the celebration of marriages between two Protestants by a Roman Catholic priest is still illegal and punishable (s).

In Ireland at common law a marriage was not valid unless a clergyman in holy orders of the united churches of England and Ireland was present at the marriage ceremony. Where, therefore, A., a member of the Established Church in Ireland, went, in 1829, accompanied by B., a Presbyterian, to the house of C., a regularly placed minister of the Presbyterians of the parish where C. resided, and there entered into a present contract of marriage with the said B., the minister performing a religious ceremony between them, according to the rites of the Presbyterian church, and A. and B. lived together as man and wife for some time afterwards ; but A., afterwards during B.'s life, married another person in a parish church in England ; it was held, on an indictment for bigamy (under 10 Geo. IV. c. 34 (rep.)), that the first contract thus entered into was not sufficient to support the indictment (t).

A woman was married in 1799, at her father's house, in Ireland, in the presence of the friends of both families, by a clergyman of the Church of England, who had been curate of the parish for eighteen years. The parish church was standing, but persons of respectability were usually married at their own houses ; the parties lived together for several years following as man and wife. Upon objection to the validity of this marriage, Best, C.J., said : ' I know of no law which says that celebration in a church is essential to the validity of a marriage in Ireland. The English Marriage Act does not apply, and I am aware of no Irish law which takes marriages performed in that country out of the rules which prevailed in this before the passing of that Act.' Dalrymple v. Dalrymple (u) has placed it beyond a doubt that a marriage so celebrated as this has been would have been held valid in this country before the existence of that statute (v). Where in support of a plea of coverture it was proved that Mrs. Q., in 1842, married Mr. Q. at the house of the Rev. F. M., and Mr. M.'s widow produced his letters of orders shewing that he had been ordained deacon and priest by bishops of the Established Church, and also proved that when persons were married at their house, her husband always made an entry in a register book, which she produced, and also gave a certificate of the marriage to the persons married ; and the register contained an entry of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Q., and Mrs. Q. proved that she married Mr. Q. as before mentioned, and produced the certificate given to her by Mr. M. ; Parke, B., held that the certificate was admissible as a part of the transaction ; but not the register ; and that the marriage was valid ; for although it was not celebrated in a church, it was a valid marriage at common law (w).

Where a woman, being a Roman Catholic, and a man, being a Protestant, went in 1826 before W., a clergyman residing in Dublin, who, in his private house, read to them the marriage service, and in the course of it asked her whether she would be the wife of the man, and asked him whether he would be her husband, to which question both of them answered, ' I will ' ; W. was reputed to be a clergyman of the Established

In order that 'error' might be brought in the House of Lords, Perrin, J., withdrew his opinion, and judgment was given for the prisoner. In the House of Lords, Lords Brougham, Denman, and Campbell held the first marriage good ; but the Lord Chancellor

Church, and a document purporting to be letters of orders signed and sealed by the late Archbishop of Tuam, dated in 1799, whereby the archbishop certified that he had ordained W. a priest, and which letters were found among W.'s papers at the time of his death in July, 1829, was admitted without proof of the handwriting or seal of the archbishop as being more than thirty years old. It was held that this document was properly received in evidence, being above thirty years old: if it had been only signed there could have been no question as to its admissibility, but it was, in fact, also sealed; but though an archbishop is a corporation sole for many purposes, yet such a certificate has no relation to his corporate character, and the seal must be considered as the seal of the natural person, and not of the corporation; and consequently that there was sufficient evidence of the marriage (x).

In a case in 1815 at the Old Bailey, a question was made, whether a marriage of a dissenter in Ireland performed in 1787 by a dissenting minister in a private room, was valid. It was contended on behalf of the prisoner, who was indicted for bigamy, that the marriage was illegal from the clandestine manner in which it was celebrated; and several Irish statutes were cited, from which it was argued that the marriage of dissenters in Ireland ought at least to be in the face of the congregation, and not in a private room. But the recorder is said to have been clearly of opinion that this marriage was valid, on the ground that as, before Lord Hardwicke's Act (26 Geo. II. c. 33), a marriage might have been celebrated in England in a house, and it was only made necessary by the enactment of positive law, to celebrate it in a church, some law should be shewn requiring dissenters to be married in a church, or in the face of the congregation, in Ireland, before this marriage could be pronounced to be illegal: whereas one of the Irish statutes, 21 & 22 Geo. III. c. 25 (y), enacted that all marriages between Protestant dissenters, celebrated by a Protestant dissenting teacher, should be good, without saying at what place they should be celebrated (z).

Under the Marriages (Ireland) Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 81), passed to remove the mischiefs created by the decision in R. v. Millis (ante, p. 1003), a marriage may be lawfully solemnised in certain registered places of public worship or before a registrar.

By sect. 4, 'Marriages between parties, both or either of whom are Presbyterians, may be solemnized between 8 a.m. and 2 p.m., with open doors, according to the forms used by Presbyterians, in certified meeting-houses, by licence of a Presbyterian minister or by publication of banns' (a).

dwelling of either of the parties previous to the marriage, within the district or presbytery (as the case may be), wherein such marriage was solemnized, for the time required by this Act, or of the consent of any person whose consent thereunto is required by law (b); and where a marriage shall have been solemnized in a certified Presbyterian meeting-house, it shall not be necessary to prove that either of the parties was a Presbyterian, or, if the marriage was by licence, that the certificate required to be delivered to the minister granting such licence had been so delivered, or, where the marriage was by banns, that a certificate of the publication of banns had been produced to the minister by whom the marriage was solemnized, in cases where such production is required by this Act; nor shall any evidence be given to prove the contrary of any of these several particulars in any suit touching the validity of such marriage, or in which such marriage shall be questioned.'

By sect. 49, 'Except in the case of marriages by Roman Catholic priests, which may now be lawfully celebrated, if any person shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry after the said thirty-first day of March [1845] in any place other than the church or chapel or certified Presbyterian meeting-house, in which banns of matrimony between the parties shall have been duly and lawfully published, or specified in the licence, where the marriage is by licence, or the church, chapel, registered building or office, specified in the notice and registrar's certificate or licence as aforesaid, or without due notice to the registrar, or without certificate of notice duly issued, or without licence from the registrar, in case such notice or licence is necessary under this Act, or in the absence of a registrar where the presence of a registrar is necessary under this Act, or if any person shall knowingly or wilfully, after the said thirty-first day of March, intermarry in any certified Presbyterian meeting-house without publication of banns, or any licence, the marriage of all such persons, except in any case hereinbefore excepted, shall be null and void.'

By the Marriage Law (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 90), s. 11, in the case of all marriages which may legally be solemnised in Ireland and do not come within the Marriages (Ireland) Act, 1844, or any Act amending it, the parties about to contract the marriage must produce to the clergyman celebrating the marriage a certificate in the form prescribed by the Act (sched. A.) from the registrar of the district in which the marriage is to be solemnised. The certificate is to be signed by the parties, and the witnesses not less than two, and the clergyman, and within three days of the marriage to be posted to the registrar, and by him entered upon the register (s. 13).

The Matrimonial Causes and Marriage Law (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1870 (c), contains provisions as to the churches in which marriages may be celebrated (s. 32), the solemnisation of marriages (s. 33), and as to the grant of licences for marriages by certain specified officials (ss. 34-37), including the secretary of the conference of the Methodist or Wesleyan Church in Ireland (d).

(b) This to some extent alters the law of Ireland as laid down in R. v. Jacobs, 1 Mood. 140, that want of consent under 9 Geo. II. c. 11 (Ir. rep.) made the marriage voidable only if proceedings were taken within the year.

(c) Amended in 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 49).

(d) 34 & 35 Vict. c. 49, s. 21.

By sect. 38, 'a marriage may, notwithstanding anything to the contrary hereinbefore in this Act contained, be lawfully solemnized by a Protestant Episcopalian clergyman between a person who is a Protestant Episcopalian and a person who is not a Protestant Episcopalian, and by a Roman Catholic clergyman between a person who is a Roman Catholic and a person who is not a Roman Catholic, provided the following conditions are complied with :—

- 1st. That such notice is given to the registrar and such certificate is issued as at the time of the passing of this Act is required by the Marriages (Ireland) Act, 1844, as amended by the Marriage Law (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1863, in every case of marriage intended to be solemnized in Ireland according to the rites of the united Church of England and Ireland, with the exception of marriages by licence or special licence, or after the publication of banns.
- 2nd. That the certificate of the registrar is delivered to the clergyman solemnizing such marriage at the time of the solemnization of the marriage.
- 3rd. That such marriage is solemnized in a building set apart for the celebration of divine service, according to the rites and ceremonies of the religion of the clergyman solemnizing such marriage, and situate in the district of the registrar by whom the certificate is issued.
- 4th. With open doors.
- 5th. That such marriage is solemnized between the hours of eight in the forenoon and two in the afternoon, in the presence of two or more credible witnesses.'

Sect. 39, after repealing 19 Geo. II. c. 13 (Ir.), as to avoiding marriages between Papists and certain Protestants, enacts that 'any marriage solemnized by a Protestant Episcopalian clergyman between a person who is a Protestant Episcopalian and a person who is not a Protestant Episcopalian, or by a Roman Catholic clergyman between a person who is a Roman Catholic and a person who is not a Roman Catholic, shall be void to all intents in cases where the parties to such marriage knowingly and wilfully intermarried without due notice to the registrar, or without certificate of notice duly issued, or without the presence of two or more credible witnesses, or in a building not set apart for the celebration of divine service, according to the rites and ceremonies of the religion of the clergyman solemnizing such marriage' (e).

By 34 & 35 Vict. c. 49, s. 27, 'Whenever a licence for the marriage of a Roman Catholic with a person not a Roman Catholic shall have been issued, pursuant to ss. 25 or 26 of this Act, such marriage may lawfully be solemnized by a Roman Catholic clergyman between such persons' (f).

established by the appearance in Court and identification of the party, or by any person who knows the parties and can distinctly prove that the first husband or wife was alive at the crucial date.

In Reed v. Norman (g), where a daughter wrote to her father in America and the fact that she about two months afterwards received a letter in reply in his handwriting dated 31st May, 1836, was held to be evidence that he was then alive.

There is no presumption of death from the mere fact that it is long since the first husband or wife was last seen or heard of (h).

In R. v. Lumley (i), the prisoner was convicted of bigamy. The first marriage was with V., in the year 1836. The second marriage was with L., on July 9, 1847. The prisoner lived with V. till the middle of 1843, when they separated, and from that time no more had been heard of him. There was no evidence as to his age. The judge at the trial directed the jury that it was a presumption of law that V. was alive at the time of the second marriage. Upon a case reserved it was held, that there was no presumption of law that life continued for seven years, or for any other period after the time of the latest proof of the life of the party, and that it was a question of fact for the jury, under the circumstances of each case, whether a person be alive or dead at any time within the interval of seven years, at the termination of which the protection afforded by statute in cases of bigamy comes into operation, and the conviction was quashed.

In R. v. Willshire (j), the prisoner had married E. E. in 1864, and while she was still alive he, in April, 1868, married A. L. He was convicted of bigamy for this, and in 1879 he married C. L., and while C. L. was still

(g) 8 C. & P. 65. Denman, C.J., held in the same case, that the postmark was evidence that the letter was put into the post, but that the letter might have been written at any time, and therefore proof was given that it was in reply to the daughter's letter; but this seems to have been unnecessary, for the date is prima facie evidence of the time when an instrument is written. See R. v. Harborne, 2 A. & E. 540. Sinclair v. Baggaley, 4 M. & W. 313. Hunt v. Massey, 5 B. & Ad. 903. Potez v. Glossop, 2 Ex. 191. Anderson v. Weston, 6 Bing. (N. C.) 296. *Morgan v. (i) L. R. 1 C. C. R. 196; 38 L. J. M. C. 86. In an indictment for bigamy it is incumbent on the prosecutor to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the husband or wife, as the case may be, was alive at the date of the second marriage, and that is purely a question of fact. The existence of the party at an antecedent period may or may not afford a reasonable inference that he was living at the subsequent date. If, for example, it were proved that he was in good health on the day preceding the second marriage, the inference would be strong, almost irresistible, that he was living on the latter day, and the jury would in all probability find that he was so. If, on the other hand, it were proved that he was then in a dying condition and nothing further was proved, they would probably decline to draw that inference. Thus the question is entirely for the jury. The law makes no presumption either way. The cases cited of R. v. Twynning, 2 M. & W. 894; R. v. Harborne, 2 A. & E. 540; and Doe d. Knight v. Nepean, 5 B. & Ad. 86, appear to establish this proposition. Where the only evidence is that the party was living at a period which is more than seven years prior to the second marriage, there is no question for the jury. The proviso in the Act then comes into operation, and exonerates the prisoner from criminal culpability, though the first husband or wife be proved to have been living at the time when the second marriage was contracted. The Legislature by this proviso sanctions a presumption that a person who has not been heard of for seven years is dead; but the proviso affords no ground for the converse proposition, viz., that when a party has been seen or heard of within seven years a presumption arises that he is still living. That is always a question of fact. See Murray v. R., 7 Q.B. 700. R. v. Apley, 1 Cox, 71.

(j) 6 Q.B.D. 366; 50 L. J. M. C. 57.

alive he, in September, 1880, married E. M. For this last marriage he was again indicted for bigamy, the indictment charging that 'his wife C.' was then alive. There was no evidence that E. E. was alive at the date of the prisoner's marriage to C. L.,—which would have made that marriage invalid,—and the judge held that under the circumstances the burden of proving that E. E. was alive at that date lay on the prisoner. He was convicted, but the Court quashed the conviction on the ground that it was a question for the jury whether upon the facts proved E. E. was alive at the date of the prisoner's marriage to C. L. If E. E. was alive at the date of the prisoner's marriage to C. L. that marriage was void (jj); and that marriage being void, the subsequent marriage with E. M. would not be bigamous, unless the prisoner could be shewn to have known of E. E.'s having been alive within the seven years, and even in that case he could not have been convicted on the indictment as it stood.

Continual Absence for Seven Years.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, does not extend to 'any person marrying a second time, whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time' (k).

This exception is available only as a defence to an indictment for bigamy, and even if proved does not validate the second marriage (l).

Where there has been such absence, the burden of proof is not upon the prisoner to shew that it was not known to him or her that the wife or husband was living within such time. On an indictment for bigamy, it was proved that the prisoner and his wife had lived apart for seven years, and that the prisoner then married again. There was no evidence of the prisoner's knowledge of the existence of his first wife at the time he married again. The prisoner was convicted. It was held, that the burden of proof that the prisoner did not know that his wife was alive at the time he contracted the second marriage was not on the prisoner, and that the conviction could not be sustained (m).

But where there was no evidence of any separation or of the date when the prisoner last saw his wife, it was held that the presumption was that the first wife was living at the time of the second marriage, although it took place seventeen years after the first marriage (n).

Even where the first husband or wife has not been continually absent for seven years it is a good defence to prove a bona fide belief upon reasonable grounds that at the time of the second marriage the first husband or wife was dead (o). Such bona fide belief is not sufficient unless proper and reasonable inquiries have in fact been made by the prisoner (p).

(jj) There being evidence that E. E. was alive in 1868, in the absence of evidence to the contrary she must be presumed to have been alive in 1879, though her disappearance for over seven years would be a bar to conviction for bigamy with E. M. Vide infra.

But the fact that the prisoner deserted his first wife does not deprive him of the defence created by the exception or that of bona fide belief (q).

Second Marriage.—It is necessary to prove that the prisoner went through a form of marriage with the second consort which, but for the existence of the impediment of the former marriage, would have been recognised as a marriage valid in form by the law under whose forms it was celebrated. The words of the statute, ‘whosoever being married shall marry any other person,’ are to be read as though they were, ‘whosoever being married shall go through the form and ceremony of marriage,’ and the form and ceremony gone through must be such as is known to and recognised by the law as capable of producing a valid marriage, and such a circumstance as that the parties are within the forbidden degree of consanguinity will not prevent the marriage from being bigamous. Where a married woman went through the ceremony of marriage with her deceased sister’s husband, it was held that although such second marriage was void under the Marriage Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 54, s. 2, ante, p. 996), yet she had committed the crime of bigamy (r).

Where the prisoner’s first wife being dead, he married again, and subsequently went through the form of marriage with his first wife’s niece, that marriage was held to be void, but it was also held that the prisoner was rightly convicted of bigamy (s).

Where in order to establish a charge of bigamy in a divorce suit it was proved that the husband married a woman in Australia according to the forms of the Church of Scotland, but there was no proof that such forms were recognised as legal by the laws of the colony, it was held that the bigamy was not established (t).

VII. c. 47, s. 1). Marriage with the sister of a divorced wife is during the lifetime of the latter still unlawful, s. 3 (2).

(s) R. v. Allen, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 367, 41 L. J. M. C. 97, which overrules the decision in R. v. Fanning, 10 Cox, 411 (Ir.), that bigamy was not committed in respect of a marriage by a Roman Catholic priest, of a Protestant to a Catholic, declared void by the Irish Act, 19 Geo. II. c. 13. Cf. R. v. Wright, 28 Ir. L. T. R. 131. In R. v. Allen the Court said: ‘In thus holding, it is not at all necessary to say that forms of marriage unknown to the law, as was the case in Burt v. Burt, infra, would suffice to bring a case within the operation of the statute. We must not be understood to mean that every fantastic form of marriage to which parties might think proper to resort, or that a marriage ceremony performed by an unauthorised person, or in an unauthorised place, would be a “marrying” within the meaning of the 57th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. It will be time enough to deal with a case of this description when it arises. It is sufficient for the present purpose to hold, as we do, that where a person already bound by an existing marriage goes through a form of marriage known to and recognised by the law as capable of producing a valid marriage, for the purpose of a pretended and fictitious marriage, the case is not the less within the statute by reason of any special circumstances which, independently of the bigamous character of the marriage, may constitute a legal disability in the particular parties, or make the form of marriage resorted to specially inapplicable to their individual case.’

(t) Burt v. Burt, 29 L. J. P. & M. 133, approved in R. v. Allen, supra. It has been held by a majority of the Court in Ireland that where the first marriage is shewn to have been contracted in a foreign state according to the laws of the Roman Catholic church it will be presumed to be valid without proof of the law of that state relating to marriage. R. v. Griffin, 14 Cox, 308.

Dissolution or Nullification.—If the first husband or wife is proved to have been alive at the date of the second marriage, it is for the defence to prove the dissolution or nullification of the marriage and not for the prosecution to negative it.

The third exception to sect. 57 (ante, p. 980) provides that the section shall not extend to any person who at the time of such second marriage shall have been divorced from the bond of the first marriage by a Court of competent jurisdiction (u). A judicial separation which has the effect of a divorce a mensâ et thoro is not within the exception (v). Under the Act of James, if a divorce a vinculo had been decreed, though an appeal by one of the parties suspended the sentence, a marriage pending the appeal was aided by the exception in that statute (w).

Under the present law a divorced person may marry again immediately after the decree of divorce has been made absolute, if the time limited for appealing has expired and no appeal has been presented, or if the appeal presented has been dismissed or on the appeal the marriage has been dissolved (x).

To avail as a defence the divorce must be by statute (y) or by the judgment of a Court having jurisdiction to dissolve the first marriage. It would seem that the words, 'by a Court of competent jurisdiction,' in sect. 57 apply to divorce a vinculo as well as to nullity.

It is immaterial where the divorce was granted if the Court granting it had jurisdiction to pronounce a decree of divorce between the parties. This jurisdiction, according to the English view of international law, depends on the domicile of the husband at the date of the proceedings.

In Lolley's case (z) the prisoner was indicted under 1 Jac. I. c. 11, for bigamy. Both his marriages were in England; but before his second marriage his wife had obtained a divorce a vinculo from him in the Commissary or Consistorial Court of Scotland (a). It appeared that he took his wife into Scotland, that she might be induced to institute a suit against him there; and that he cohabited with a prostitute there, for the very purpose of irritating his wife, and furnishing ground for the divorce. The question then arose whether the Scotch divorce came within the exception in the statute of James. The point was reserved. The judges were unanimous that no sentence or act of any foreign country or state (u) The Act of James did not apply where the first marriage was between persons below the age of consent, 3 Co. Inst. 59, nor where a divorce a mensâ et thoro has been granted. 1 Hale, 694. 3 Co. could dissolve an English marriage a vinculo for grounds on which it was not liable to be dissolved a vinculo in England; and that no divorce of an Ecclesiastical Court was within the exception in the third section of the statute, unless it was the divorce of a Court within the limits to which that statute extended (b). The judges gave no opinion upon the husband's conduct in drawing on his wife to sue for the divorce, because the jury had not found fraud.

It is clear that in Lolley's case the domicile of the husband was English and not Scotch (c), and the case has been much commented upon, and must be treated as either wrong in itself or as inapplicable to the words of the present statute, which contains the words 'any Court of competent jurisdiction,' and is not limited like the Act of James to Ecclesiastical Courts. According to the ruling decisions, both in the House of Lords (d) and in the Privy Council (e), the test of competency of a Court to grant a divorce a vinculo depends not on the place where the marriage was celebrated nor on the nationality of the parties, but on the bona fide existing domicile of the husband at the date when the Court is asked to exercise its jurisdiction (f). The English Courts will, however, recognise a decree of divorce by a Court not of the domicile if the Court of the domicile would recognise the decree (g).

The English Courts will recognise as valid the decision of a competent Christian tribunal, dissolving the marriage between a person domiciled in the country where such tribunal has jurisdiction, and an English woman, when the decree of divorce is not impeached by any species of collusion or fraud, and this although the marriage may have been solemnised in England, and may have been dissolved for a cause which would not have been sufficient to obtain a divorce in England (h).

The fourth exception to sect. 57 (ante, p. 980) is that the Act shall not extend 'to any person whose former marriage shall have been declared void by the sentence of any Court of competent jurisdiction.' It was resolved upon the Act of James, by all the judges, that a sentence of the spiritual Court against a marriage, in a suit of jactitation of marriage, was not conclusive evidence so as to stop the counsel for the Crown from proving the marriage; the sentence having decided on the invalidity of the marriage only collaterally, and not directly; and further, admitting such sentence to be conclusive, yet that counsel for the Crown might avoid the effect of such sentence, by proving it to have been obtained by fraud or collusion (i).

(b) The words of 1 Jac. I. c. 11, were 'divorced by any sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court.' The words of s. 57 are, 'divorced from the bond of the first marriage.' 'These words are so much more general, that it may be contended that they except every case where, according to the laws of the country where the divorce takes place, there is a legal divorce a vinculo matrimonii, and the words "any Court of competent jurisdiction" in the next clause, instead of the words "the Ecclesiastical Court," in 1 Jac. I. c. 11, seem to favour this view of the exception.' C. S. G.

There is no exception in the Act where marriages are within the age of consent (j).

The dissolution or nullification of the marriage must be proved by producing the private Act (k) or the judgment, decree, or sentence of the Court which purported to dissolve or annul the marriage, and by establishing the competence of the tribunal to grant a decree which is valid according to English views of international private law.

It has been held that a Jewish divorce can only be proved by producing the document of divorce delivered by the husband to the wife (l). But this ruling, if good for any purpose (m), does not apply to dissolution or nullification in England of a Jewish marriage, and if still applicable to such divorces granted abroad must be supplemented by evidence that such divorce was valid in the country in which it took place, e.g. in Turkey, where marriage and divorce are regulated by the law of the religious community to which the parties belong (n).

SECT. II.—FALSE STATEMENTS MADE TO OBTAIN OR PREVENT MARRIAGE.

By the Marriage Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 76), 'For avoiding all fraud and collusion in obtaining licences for marriage' (o), it is enacted (s.14), 'that before any such licence be granted, one of the parties shall personally swear before the surrogate (p), or other person having authority to grant the same, that he or she believeth that there is no impediment of kindred or alliance or of any other lawful cause nor any suit commenced in any Ecclesiastical Court to bar or hinder the proceeding of the said matrimony according to the tenor of the said licence, and that one of the parties hath for the space of fifteen days immediately preceding such licence had his or her usual place of abode within the parish or chapelry within which such marriage is to be solemnized: and where either of the parties, not being a widow or widower, shall be under the age of twenty-one years, that the consent of the person or persons whose consent is required under the provisions of this Act (q) have been obtained thereto: Provided always, that if there be no such person or persons having authority to give consent, then upon oath made to that effect by the party requiring such licence it shall be lawful to grant such licence notwithstanding the want of any such consent.'

(p) By the canon law and the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts the surrogate has power to administer the oath (see canon 103 of 1603 and R. v. Chapman, 1 Den. 432, Parke, B.). And see 7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 22, s. 30, post, p. 1013. By 3 Geo. IV. c. 75, s. 10 (rep.), a false oath before a surrogate was made perjury. No specific provision to that effect is contained in the Act of 1823. In R. v. Fairlie, 9 Cox, 209, the defendant was indicted for falsely swearing before a surrogate that the father had given his consent to the marriage of his daughter. The evidence was that the girl was the illegitimate daughter of G. E., who had not given his consent to her marriage. The Recorder held that, as the indictment had described G. E. as the natural and lawful father, and the evidence shewed that E. A. E. had no natural and lawful father, the prisoner must be acquitted, on the ground of variance between the indictment and the evidence. The question whether the putative father came within 4 Geo. IV. c. 26, s. 16, was not decided.

An offence within the section may be committed by a person falsely swearing that he is one of the parties for whose marriage the licence is required (r). The offence is committed even when the marriage has not been and will not be solemnised (s). In R. v. Chapman (s) the prisoner had personated the man for whom the licence was required and had falsely stated the residence of the woman.

An oath taken under the section which is false to the knowledge of the taker in any one of the essential particulars required by the section, seems not to be punishable as perjury but is indictable as a misdemeanor at common law, because it is an attempt to deceive a public officer with reference to a matter of public concern (t).

By sect. 30 of the Registration Act, 1837 (7 Will. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 22), 'Every person before whom by the said Acts' (i.e. Marriage Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 85), or the Marriage Registration Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 86)) 'or either of them, an oath is directed to be taken, is hereby authorised to administer the same.'

By the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 86), s. 41, 'Every person who shall wilfully make or cause to be made for the purpose of being inserted in any register (u) of . . . marriage any false statement touching any of the particulars herein required to be known and registered (v) shall be subject to the same penalties as if he were guilty of perjury' (w).

To support an indictment under this section it is essential that the false statement should have been made wilfully and intentionally and not by mistake only (x).

The Marriage Act, 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 72), which provides for the solemnisation of marriages in buildings out of the district wherein one or both parties have dwelt for the time required by the Marriage Act, 1823 (ss. 1-3), enacts (s. 4) that 'every person who shall knowingly and wilfully make any false declaration under the provisions of this Act for the purpose of procuring any marriage out of the district in which the parties or one of them shall dwell shall suffer the penalties of perjury (y). Provided always that no such prosecution shall take place after the expiration of eighteen calendar months from the solemnization of such marriage.'

By the Marriage and Registration Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 119), s. 2, 'Every person who shall knowingly or wilfully make and sign or subscribe any false declaration, or who shall sign any false notice (z) for the purpose of procuring any marriage under the provisions of any of the said recited Acts (a) or this Act shall suffer the penalties of perjury' (b).

(u) The Registrar-General is required to provide these registers (5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 86, s. 30), but on a prosecution for an offence

By sect. 18, 'Any person who shall knowingly or wilfully make any false declaration or sign any false notice required by this Act for the purpose of procuring any marriage, and every person who shall forbid the granting by any superintendent registrar of a certificate for marriage by falsely representing himself or herself to be a person whose consent to such marriage is required by law, knowing such representation to be false, shall suffer the penalties of perjury' (c).

This penal provision extends to banns published or certificates issued on King's ships at sea (cc).

By the Foreign Marriage Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 23), s. 15, 'If a person—

(a) knowingly and wilfully makes a false oath (d) or signs a false notice (e) under this Act, for the purpose of procuring a marriage; or

(b) forbids a marriage under this Act by falsely representing himself to be a person whose consent to the marriage is required by law, knowing such representation to be false, such person shall suffer the penalties of perjury (c) and may be tried in any county in England and dealt with in the same manner in all respects as if the offence had been committed in that county.'

By sect. 17, 'All the provisions and penalties of the Marriage Registration Acts, relating to any registrar or register of marriages or certified copies thereof, shall extend to every marriage officer, and to the registers of marriages under this Act, and to the certified copies thereof (so far as the same are applicable thereto), as if herein re-enacted and in terms made applicable to this Act, and as if every marriage officer were a registrar under the said Acts.'

By the Marriage Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 58), which relates to marriages in buildings in England registered for solemnising marriage therein under the Marriage Act, 1836, solemnisation of marriages may take place without the presence of the registrar (unless the parties give him notice requiring his attendance) but in the presence of a person duly authorised under the Act and according to such form and ceremony as the parties may see fit to adopt (ss. 4–10). The Act came into operation on April 1, 1899 (s. 3), and it does not extend to Scotland or Ireland (s. 2).

By sect. 12, 'If any authorised person refuses or fails to comply with this Act or the enactments or regulations for the time being in force with respect to the solemnization and registration of marriages he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £10, or on conviction on indictment to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding two years or to a fine not exceeding £50, and shall on conviction cease to be an authorised person.'

By sect. 15, 'So much of sects. 39 and 42 of the Marriage Act, 1836 (f), as punishes the solemnisation of or renders void any marriage by reason of the absence of the registrar is hereby repealed as regards any marriage authorised by and solemnized in accordance with this Act.'

By sect. 6 (3), "authorised person" is defined as "a person certified as having been duly authorised for the purpose by the trustees or other governing body of the building or of some registered building in the same registration district" including by sect. 1 in the case of Roman Catholic registered buildings "the bishop or vicar-general of the diocese."

By the Naval Marriages Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. c. 26), s. 3, 'All enactments (including penal provisions) relating—

- (1) to the publication of banns and certificates thereof, and
- (2) to notices and declarations for obtaining certificates from superintendent registrars and to such certificates and to all rules required under such enactments to be observed shall apply in the case of marriages to which this Act applies, subject to such adaptations therein as may be made by his Majesty by Order in Council' (g).

SECT. III.—OFFENCES WITH RESPECT TO SOLEMNISATION, REGISTRATION, &C.

Royal Marriages.—Marriages of members of the Royal family are specially excepted from the Marriage and Registration Acts (h), and are governed by the Royal Marriages Act, 1772 (12 Geo. III. c. 11), which confirms the prerogative of the Crown to superintend and approve of the marriages of the Royal family (i). The first section enacts, 'That no descendant of the body of his late Majesty King George the Second, male or female (other than the issue of princesses who may have married, or may hereafter marry, into foreign families) (j), shall be capable of contracting matrimony without the previous consent of his Majesty, his heirs, or successors, signified under the great seal, and declared in council (which consent, to preserve the memory thereof, is hereby directed to be set out in the licence and register of marriage, and to be entered in the books of the privy council); and that every marriage or matrimonial contract of any such descendant, without such consent first had and obtained, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.'

The only words in the section essential to make the marriage valid are those requiring the previous consent of His Majesty. The words requiring the recording of the consent on the licence and register of marriage are directory only, and apply only to cases where the marriage is celebrated in England by licence (k).

By sect. 2 provision is made for a marriage, without the Royal consent, of any such descendant, being above twenty-five years of age, after notice to the privy council and the expiration of twelve months after such notice; in case the two Houses of Parliament do not before that time expressly declare their disapprobation of the marriage.

By sect. 3, . . . 'Every person who shall knowingly or wilfully presume to solemnize, or to assist or to be present at the celebration of any marriage, with any such descendant, or at his or her making any matrimonial contract, without such consent as aforesaid first had and obtained, except in the case above mentioned, shall, being duly convicted thereof, incur and suffer the pains and penalties, ordained and provided by the Statute of Provision and Præmunire made in the sixteenth year of the reign of Richard the Second' (c. 5, Rev. Stat. (2nd ed.), vol. i. p. 173).

This Act applies to all Royal persons falling within its terms, irrespective of the place where the marriage takes place (l); but the penal clause is defective in not providing for the trial of British subjects who violate the Act outside the realm (m).

Church of England.—It has not been decided whether refusal by a clergyman of the Church of England to solemnise marriage between a couple who are his parishioners is indictable (n). A man and woman who had obtained a certificate of marriage from a registrar under 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 85, requested a clergyman to appoint a day and hour for marrying them at his church. He refused to marry them unless the man consented to be confirmed. For this refusal the clergyman was indicted as for a statutory offence. The indictment failed for want of proof of a proper demand, but the Court did not decide that the refusal would be indictable even by reference to the statute, and Patteson, J., said that refusal to marry after banns would not be indictable (n).

The clergy of the Church of England and of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Ireland are not subject to any obligation to solemnise the marriage of a person whose former marriage has been dissolved on the ground of his or her adultery (o); and a clergyman of the Church of England is not bound to solemnise a marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister (p).

The Marriage Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 76), which relates only to marriages by licence or banns in churches or chapels of the Established Church of England, enacts (s. 21) that 'if any person shall, from and after the said first day of November [1823], solemnize matrimony in any other place than a church or such public chapel wherein banns may be lawfully published, or at any other time than between the hours of eight in the forenoon and three in the afternoon (q) unless by special licence from the Archbishop of Canterbury; or shall solemnize matrimony without due publication of banns, unless licence of marriage be first had and obtained from some person or persons having authority to grant the same (r) : or if any person falsely pretending to be in holy orders, shall solemnize matrimony according to the rites of the Church of England, every person knowingly and wilfully so offending, and being lawfully convicted thereof, shall be deemed and adjudged to be guilty of felony, and shall be transported for the space of fourteen (s) years, according to the laws in force for transportation of felons, provided that all prosecutions for such felony shall be commenced within the space of three years after the offence committed' (t).

The mere fact of institution to a living is no evidence that the person instituted is in orders, nor does it put him in the position of a person who has received holy orders, nor make him compellable to celebrate marriages. The question for the jury is, first, whether the prisoner has ever acquired the position and status which made him an ordained minister (u), and if not, whether he knew at the time he performed the ceremony that he had never been ordained (v).

The Marriage Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 85), provides for civil marriages, at the office of a registrar of marriages, and for marriages in his presence at a registered place of worship not belonging to the Church of England, or by the rules of the Church of England on a certificate from the registrar. By sect. 39, 'Every person who after the said first day of March [1837], shall knowingly and wilfully solemnize any marriage in England, except by special licence, in any other place than a church or chapel in which marriages may be solemnized according to the rites of the Church of England, or than the registered building or office specified in the notice and certificate as aforesaid, shall be guilty of felony (except in the case of a marriage between two of the Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, according to the usages of the said society, or between two persons professing the Jewish religion, according to the usage of the Jews), and every person who in any such registered building or office shall knowingly and wilfully solemnize any marriage in the absence of a registrar (w) of the district in which such registered building or office is situated, shall be guilty of felony (x) : and every person who shall knowingly and wilfully solemnize any marriage in England after the said first day of March (except by licence) within twenty-one days after the entry of the notice to the superintendent registrar as aforesaid . . . Sect. 40. 'Every superintendent registrar who shall knowingly and wilfully issue any certificate for marriage after the expiration of three calendar months after the notice shall have been entered by him as aforesaid, or any certificate for marriage by licence before the expiration of seven days after the entry of the notice, or any certificate for marriage without licence before the expiration of twenty-one days after the entry of the notice (b), or any certificate, the issue of which shall have been forbidden as aforesaid by any person authorised to forbid the issue of the registrar's certificate, or who shall knowingly and wilfully register any marriage herein declared to be null and void, and every registrar who shall knowingly and wilfully issue any licence for marriage after the expiration of three calendar months after the notice shall have been entered by the registrar as aforesaid, or who shall knowingly and wilfully solemnize in his office any marriage herein declared to be null and void, shall be guilty of felony.'

- (b) to 'forge or fraudulently alter in any such register any entry relating to any . . . marriage or any part of any such register or any certified copy of such register or of any part thereof' (i).
- (c) 'knowingly and unlawfully' to 'insert or cause or permit to be inserted in any such register or in any certified copy thereof any false entry of any matter relating to any . . . marriage' (j).
- (d) 'knowingly and unlawfully' to 'give any false certificate relating to any . . . marriage.'
- (e) to 'certify any writing to be a copy or extract from any such register knowing such writing or the part of such register whereof such copy or extract shall be so given to be false in any material particular.'
- (f) to 'forge or counterfeit the seal of or belonging to any registry office.'
- (g) to 'offer, utter, dispose of, or put off, any such register, entry, certified copy, certificate, or seal knowing the same to be false, forged or altered.'
- (h) to 'offer, utter, dispose of, or put off, any copy of any entry in any such register knowing such entry to be false, forged or altered.'

Sect. 36 does not apply to the correction of accidental errors by the officiating minister (k) or registrar (l).

By sect. 37 it is also felony punishable by penal servitude for life (m):—

- (a) 'knowingly and wilfully' to 'insert or cause or permit to be inserted in any copy of any register directed or required by law to be transmitted to any registrar or other officer any false entry of any matter relating to any . . . marriage.'
- (b) to 'forge or alter' or to 'offer, utter, dispose of, or put off, knowing the same to be forged or altered, any copy of any register so directed or required to be transmitted as aforesaid.'
- (c) 'knowingly and wilfully' to 'sign or verify any copy of any register so directed or required to be transmitted as aforesaid which copy shall be false in any part thereof, knowing the same to be false.'
- (d) 'unlawfully' to 'destroy, deface, or injure, or for any fraudulent purpose' to 'take from its place of deposit or conceal any such copy of any register.'

(h) Certified copies of registers of marriages are made up four times a year by the clergy, &c., who keep them, and sent to the superintendent registrar or registrar of the district (6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 86, s. 33; 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 22, s. 30); and the latter has also quarterly to send to the Registrar-General the certified copies so received (6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 86, s. 34).

(j) Fraudulent intention is not an essential element in the offence. R. v. Asplin [1873], 12 Cox, 391, where the defendant was convicted of falsely signing his name in the register as brother of the bridegroom. To give false information for the purpose of insertion in the register or false information as to a death is within the section. Anon. Anglesey Assizes, July 24, 1875, Coleridge, L.C.J.

OFFENCES WITH REFERENCE TO MARRIAGE.

Bigamy, Definition of.—Code sec. 307.

Incompetency no Defence.—Code sec. 307(2).

Excuses.—Code sec. 307(3).

Bigamous Marriages Outside Canada.—Code sec. 307(4).

Form Valid Despite Default of Accused.—Code sec. 307(5).

Jurisdiction of Parliament.—A British subject, domiciled in Canada, and only temporarily absent, continues to owe to Her Majesty, in relation to her government of Canada, an obligation to refrain from the completion, whilst absent without any animus manendi, of a prohibited act, a material part of which is committed by him in Canada. Re Bigamy Sections; R. v. Brinkley, 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 454.

The onus is on the Crown to prove the facts that the defendant was, at the time of the second marriage, a British subject, resident in Canada, and had left Canada with intent to commit the offence. R. v. Pierce (1887), 13 Ont. R. 226.

Where the indictment is laid under sub-section 4 of sec. 307, for leaving Canada with intent, it should aver that the accused then was a British subject resident in Canada (stating the place in Canada), and that he then being married, left Canada with intent to go through the form of marriage with another person, and did go through such form of marriage in the foreign country (giving name, time and place). R. v. McQuiggan, 2 Lower Canada R. 340.

It is suggested in Canada Criminal Law (Tremear) p. 251, that a British subject, resident in Canada, and punishable there for an offence under sec. 307(4), might be tried and punished in England or Ireland for a bigamous marriage in a foreign country, under Imp. Act. 24 & 25 Vict. ch. 100, sec. 57. Earl Russell's Case (1901), A.C. 446, supra 980.

Mens Rea.—The provisoes (a) and (b) of sub-sec. 3, are supplementary to the common law doctrine of mens rea. A guilty mind is an essential ingredient of the offence of bigamy, and if a woman, after obtaining information that the man, with whom she has gone through a form of marriage, is already married, leaves him and marries another man, her honest and reasonable belief, that the man she left had a wife living, is a good defence to a charge of bigamy. Semble, the fact of such honest and reasonable belief may be found from the circumstances of the case without strict proof of the man's former marriage. The King v. Sellars (1905), 9 Can. Cr. Cas. 153 (N.S.).

An absence of mens rea is not to be inferred from the knowledge of the husband that a divorce had been decreed by the foreign Court on his wife's application, and from his having first obtained legal advice that he could legally marry again. R. v. Brinkley (1907), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 454, 13 O.L.R. 434. (Compare R. v. Thomson (1905), 70 J.P. 6.)

Lengthened Absence.—In R. v. Smith (1857), 14 U.C.Q.B. 565, the first was living at the time of the second ceremony, and it was held that the accused must shew enquiries made, and bonâ fide and reasonable belief in the wife's death, to excuse his conduct. This decision would not now be followed in the light of R. v. Curgerwen (1865), L.R. 1 C.C.R. 1, and of the particular form of words used in sec. 407(b).

Evidence of a confession by a prisoner of his first marriage is not evidence upon which he can be convicted (following R. v. Savage, 13 Cox 178; R. v. Ray, 20 Q.R. 212. But in R. v. Creamer, 10 L.C.R. 404, the Court of the Queen's Bench (Quebec), decided to the opposite effect. See also R. v. McQuiggan, 2 L.C.R. 346.

Validity.—On an indictment for bigamy, the witness called to prove the first marriage, swore that it was solemnized by a justice of the peace in the State of New York, who had power to marry; but this witness was not a lawyer or an inhabitant of the United States, and did not shew how the authority of the justice was derived. This evidence was held to be insufficient. R. v. Smith (1857), 14 U.C.Q.B. 565; R. v. Ray (1890), 20 O.R. 212.

Upon trials for bigamy proof is required of a first marriage in fact, such as the Court can judicially hold to be valid; mere evidence of cohabitation, and reputation of being married, will not do. R. v. Smith (1857), 14 U.C.Q.B. 656, per Robinson, C.J.

In another case to prove the second marriage, which took place in Michigan, the evidence of the officiating minister, a clergyman of the Methodist Church for twenty-five years, during which time he had solemnized many marriages, that this marriage was solemnized according to the law of the State of Michigan, was held admissible and sufficient. R. v. Brierly (1887), 14 O.R. 535.

In Fact.—On a trial for bigamy, in proof of the prior marriage, a deed was produced executed by the prisoner, containing a recital of the prisoner having a wife and child in England, and conveying real property to two trustees to receive and pay over the rents to his wife, but with a power of revocation to the prisoner. B., one of the trustees, proved the execution of the deed, and that at the time of its execution the prisoner informed him that he had a wife and child living in England, but that he had never paid over any of the rents to her, nor had he ever written to or heard from such alleged wife. It was held that this was not sufficient evidence to prove the alleged prior marriage. R. v. Duff (1878), 29 U.C.C.P. 255.

Foreign Divorce.—Where both parties to a marriage in Canada are of Canadian domicile, but afterwards become bonâ fide domiciled in a foreign country, a decree of divorce, obtained in the foreign country, while they are domiciled there, will be valid in Canada as a defence to a prosecution of either for bigamy in having re-married. A decree of divorce, granted by a Court foreign to the domicile of both parties, pronounced by consent or collusion of the parties both temporarily resident within its jurisdiction, and which recites due proof of grounds sufficient under the foreign law for dissolving a marriage, is invalid in Canada if it be proved that such recital is incorrect, and that, in fact, no evidence was given. R. v. Woods (1903), 7 Can. Cr. Cas. 226, 6 O.L.R. 41.

A foreign divorce will be valid when granted by the Courts of a state in which the husband and wife had a bonâ fide domicile, although the wife was living in this province, provided that she was personally served with notice of the divorce proceedings, which were not collusive or contrary to natural justice. Guest v. Guest, 3 O.R. 344.

If the parties have their domicile in a foreign country, and are divorced there without collusion or fraud, by a Court of competent jurisdiction, such a divorce is valid in Canada, and that quite irrespective of the place of marriage, or of the residence or allegiance of the parties, or of their domicile at the time of the marriage, or of the place in which the offence, in respect of which the divorce was granted, was committed. Stevens v. Fiske, Cassels S.C. Dig. 235, 8 Montreal Legal News 42; and see an article by W. E. Raney, K.C., in 34 C.L.J., pp. 546-553. And see Swaizie v. Swaizie, 31 O.R. 330.

Residence abroad is not sufficient to effect a change of domicile, even where such domicile is not the domicile of origin, but one acquired by choice, unless it is accompanied by an intention to remain abroad, and not to return to the former domicile. Bonbright v. Bonbright (1901), 2 O.L.R. 249; McNamara v. Constantineau, 3 Rev. de Jur. (Que.) 482.

A foreign divorce, obtained by the wife of a British subject, domiciled in Canada without service of process on the husband, or submission on his part, to the jurisdiction of the foreign Court, is ineffective to dissolve a marriage performed in Canada, although the wife had, some years before applying for the divorce, left her husband, and taken up residence in the foreign country. A British subject, married and domiciled in Canada, who goes to the United States, accompanied by another woman, for the purpose of marrying her there, and who goes through the form of marriage with her there, and forthwith returns with her to Canada, is guilty of bigamy, and is properly convicted thereof in Canada under sec. 307, notwithstanding such foreign divorce obtained by his first wife. R. v. Brinkley (1907), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 454, 14 O.L.R. 434.

Punishment for Bigamy.—Bigamy is an indictable offence, punishable by seven years' imprisonment; and, after a previous conviction, by fourteen years' imprisonment. Code sec. 308.

Feigned Marriages.—Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to seven years' imprisonment, who procures a feigned or pretended marriage between himself and any woman, or who knowingly aids or assists in procuring such feigned or pretended marriage. Code sec. 309.

A person accused of an offence under this section shall not be convicted upon the evidence of one witness, unless such witness is corroborated in some material particular by evidence implicating the accused. Sec. 1002.

Polygamy.

(a) Practising or Contracting—

(1) Polygamy. Code sec. 310.

(2) Conjugal union. Code sec. 310.

(3) Spiritual marriages. Code sec. 310.

(b) Cohabitation in conjugal union. Code sec. 310

(c) Celebrating rite or ceremony. Code sec. 310.

(d) Assisting in compliance with form. Code sec. 310.

(e) Procuring form of contract. Code sec. 310.

An Indian who, according to the customs of his tribe, takes two women at the same time as his wives, and cohabits with them, is guilty of an offence under this section. R. v. "Bear's Shin Bone" (1899), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 329 (N.W.T.).

The mere fact of cohabitation between a man and a woman, each of whom is married to another, will not sustain a conviction under this section (formerly 53 Vict. (Can.) ch. 37, sec. 11), to come within the terms of which there must be "some form of contract between the parties which they might suppose to be binding on them, but which the law was intended to prohibit," and the term "conjugal union" in the statute has reference to a form of ceremony joining the parties, a marriage of some sort before cohabiting with one another. The Queen v. Labrie (1891), Montreal Law Reports, 7 Q.B. 211.

In R. v. Liston, 34 C.L.J. 546, Armour, C.J., held that adultery is not indictable under sec. 310(b). But in R. v. Harris (1906), 11 Can. Cr. Cas. 254, it was held by Mulvena, D.M. (Que.), that a man is guilty of an offence under this sub-section who lives "in open, continuous adultery to the scandal of the public." It was not shewn in this case that the accused had gone through any form of marriage with the married woman he was cohabiting with, nor was it found as a fact that he lived with her "in any kind of conjugal union," though there was evidence from which this might perhaps have been found.

Unlawful Solemnization of Marriage.—Code sec. 311.

In Ontario.—The Mormon organization known as “the Recognized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints,” was held in Ontario to be a church and religious denomination within the meaning of the Ontario Marriage Act, although not incorporated in Ontario; and its ordained ministers resident in Ontario are therefore competent to solemnize marriages. R. v. Dickout, 24 O.R. 250.

Marriage Contrary to Law.—Code sec. 312.

Certain persons met and professed to form themselves into an independent church or congregation known as “The First Chinese Christian Church, Toronto,” and appointed the defendant, one of their numbers, the minister of the church. At a subsequent meeting he was ordained by two congregationalist ministers, not as a Congregationalist minister, but as a minister of the new independent church. Held, that he was not a minister, ordained or appointed according to the rites and ceremonies of the church or denomination to which he belonged, within the meaning of R.S.O. (1897) ch. 162, sec. 2, sub-sec. 1; and the above facts appearing upon his indictment and trial for solemnizing or pretending to solemnize a marriage without lawful authority, contrary to sec. 311 of the Criminal Code, there was evidence upon which he could be convicted; and his conviction was affirmed. R. v. Brown (1909), 17 O.L.R. 698.

CHAPTER THE THIRTEENTH.

OF CRIMINAL LIBELS.

SECT. I.—PRELIMINARY.

APART from the subject of treason (not dealt with in this work) it is criminal to utter words or publish writings or exhibit matters which are (a) blasphemous, (b) seditious, (c) obscene, or (d) defamatory of individuals. The gist of the offence in the case of classes (a), (b) and (c) is the mischief to religion or government, including the administration of justice, or to public morals, which the publication or exhibition is calculated to cause, and in case (d) the risk of causing a breach of the public peace.

These offences were in the sixth edition of this work treated together under the head of libel and indictable slander. It has been found better to relegate them to more appropriate titles, as all the offences except defamatory libel may be by speech or act as well as by writing, print, &c.

As to blasphemous publications, see ante, p. 393.

As to sedition, see ante, p. 301.

As to indecent publications and exhibitions, see, post, Vol. ii. pp. 1875 et seq.

As to interference by invective, &c., with the administration of justice, see ante, Book VII. Chapter II. p. 537.

SECT. II.—DEFAMATORY LIBEL.

The publication of matter defamatory of any living private person (a) or definite class of living persons (b), is an indictable misdemeanor at common law, if effected by writing or print or by signs (c), effigies (d), or pictures (e). Such matter is usually referred to as 'libel' (f). Words spoken, however defamatory, are not the subject of indictment unless they directly tend to a breach of the peace: e.g. by conveying a challenge to fight (g), or are seditious (h), or blasphemous (i), or perhaps obscene (j), or constitute an incitement to the commission of an indictable offence (k).

(f) A defamatory libel is termed Libellus famosus seu infamatoria scriptura, and has been usually treated of as scandal, written or expressed by symbols. Lamb. Sax. Law

'There is no other name but that of libel applicable to the offence of libelling; and we know the offence specifically by that name, as we know the offences of horse-stealing, forgery, &c., by the names which the law has annexed to them.' R. v. Wilkes, 2 Wils. (K.B.) 121, Camden, C.J.

(h) Ante, p. 301.

(i) Ante, p. 393.

(j) Post, Vol. ii. p. 1875. (k) Ante, p. 203.

One spouse cannot take criminal proceedings against the other for defamatory libel (l), and communication by one spouse to another of defamatory matter is not publication (m).

A defamatory libel which is actionable is also indictable, subject to the power and inclination of juries to acquit where the nature of the libel renders civil proceedings the appropriate remedy (n), and the disposition of the Courts to discourage criminal prosecutions launched merely to extract apologies or vindicate private character (o). But in certain cases, e.g. in the case of libels on the dead, defamation may be indictable, although it is not actionable (p).

Matter is defamatory if it tends to blacken the character of another and thereby to expose him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule (q).

In Thorley v. Lord Kerry (r), Sir J. Mansfield, C.J., said: 'There is no doubt that this is a libel for which the plaintiff in error might have been indicted and punished, because, though the words impute no punishable crimes, they contain that sort of imputation which is calculated to vilify a man, and bring him, as the books say, into hatred, contempt, and ridicule; for all words of that description an indictment lies.'

As every person desires to appear agreeable in life, and must be highly provoked by such ridiculous representations of him as tend to lessen him in the esteem of the world, and take away his reputation, which to some men is more dear than life itself; it has been held that not only charges of a flagrant nature, reflecting a moral (s) turpitude on the party, are defamatory, but also such as set him in a discreditable (t), scurrilous, ignominious, or ludicrous (u) light, whether expressed in printing or writing, or by signs or pictures; for these equally create ill blood, and provoke the parties to acts of revenge and breaches of the peace (v). In R. v. Cobbett (w), Ellenborough, C.J., said: 'No man has a right to render the person or abilities of another ridiculous, not only in publications but if the peace and welfare of individuals, or of society, be interrupted, or even exposed by types and figures, the act, by the law of England, is a libel.'

From the point of view of criminal law the gist of an indictment for libel is its tendency to lead to a breach of the public peace (x).

This must be understood, however, of cases where the libel, from its nature and subject, inflicts a private injury, and not of those cases in which the public only can be said to be affected by the libel.

The letter was opened by the parents of the young woman and was not seen by the young woman herself. R. v. Adams, 22 Q.B.D. 66. See also R. v. Holbrook, 4 Q.B.D. 42, 46, Lush, J.

Defamatory libel is ranked among criminal offences because of its supposed tendency to raise angry passion, provoke revenge, and thus endanger the public peace (y).

A libel against an individual may consist in the exposure of some personal deformity, the actual existence of which would only shew the greater malice in the defendant; and even if it contain charges of misconduct founded on fact, the publication will not be the less likely to produce a violation of the public tranquillity, and it has been observed that persons having a grievance ought to complain for the injury done to them in the ordinary course of law, and not to avenge themselves by the odious proceeding of a libel (z).

Upon these principles it has been held to be defamatory to write of a man that he had the itch, and stunk of brimstone (a). And an information was granted against the mayor of a town for sending to a nobleman a licence to keep a public-house (b). An information was also granted for a publication reflecting upon a person who had been unsuccessful in a lawsuit (c); and against the printer of a newspaper for publishing a ludicrous paragraph giving an account of the marriage of a nobleman with an actress, and of his appearing with her in the boxes with jewels, &c. (d). A defendant was convicted for publishing in a review, matter tending to traduce, vilify, and ridicule an officer of high rank in the Navy; and to insinuate that he wanted courage and veracity; and to cause it to be believed that he was of a conceited, obstinate, and incendiary disposition (e). And an information was granted against a printer of a newspaper, for publishing a paragraph representing the Bishop of Derry as a bankrupt (f). Where a count alleged that the defendant published of the Duke of Brunswick the following libel: 'Why should T. be surprised at anything Mrs. W. does? If she chooses to entertain the Duke of Brunswick, she does what very few will do; and she is of course at liberty to follow the bent of her own inclining, by inviting all the expatriated foreigners who crowd our streets to her table, if she thinks fit'; the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the matter stated was defamatory, as it might be understood in such a sense as to be injurious to the prosecutor's character (g). But it was held not to be criminal to circulate a handbill: 'B. O., game and rabbit destroyer, and his wife, the seller of the same in country or in town,' in

It is said, however, that this rule may be dispensed with, if the imputations of the libel are general and indefinite, or if it is a charge against the prosecutor for language which he has held in Parliament. *R. v. the absence of any allegation or proof that the words implied illegal or improper destruction of game or rabbits (h).

Imputations on a man in respect of his trade or business, e.g. by denying his honesty or solvency, are actionable and might in a strong case be made the subject of indictment (i). But there does not seem to be any instance of an indictment for disparaging the goods of a trader (j).

Defamation may be effected as well by description, circumlocution, or insinuation as in express terms, and scandal conveyed by way of allegory or irony amounts to a libel. As where a writing, in a taunting manner, reckoning up several acts of public charity done by a person said, 'You will not play the Jew, nor the hypocrite,' and then proceeded, in a strain of ridicule, to insinuate that what the person did was owing to his vainglory. Or where a publication, pretending to recommend to a person the characters of several great men for his imitation, instead of taking notice of what great men are generally esteemed famous for, selected such qualities as their enemies accuse them of not possessing (as by proposing such a one to be imitated for his courage who was known to be a great statesman, but no soldier; and another to be imitated for his learning who was known to be a great general, but no scholar); such a publication being as well understood to mean reproach to the parties with the want of these qualities as if it had done so directly and expressly (k). And upon the same ground, not only an allegory, but a publication in hieroglyphics, or a rebus or anagram, which are still more difficult to be understood, may be defamatory (l). So a man may be defamed by asking questions; for if a man insinuates a fact by asking a question, meaning thereby to assert it, it is the same thing as if he asserted it in terms (m).

A defamatory writing, expressing only one or two letters of a name, in such a manner that from what goes before, and follows after, it must needs be understood to signify a particular person, in the plain, obvious, and natural construction of the whole, and would be nonsense if strained to any other meaning, is as much a libel as if it had expressed the whole name at large (n).

(n) Formerly it was the practice to say that words were to be taken in the more lenient sense; but that doctrine is now exploded; they are not to be taken in the more lenient or more severe sense, but in the sense which fairly belongs to them, and which they were intended to convey. R. v. Lambert and Perry, 2 Camp. 403, Ellenborough, C.J. And in R. v. Watson, 2 T. R. 206, Buller, J., said: 'Upon occasions of this sort I have never adopted any other rule than that which has been frequently repeated by Lord Mansfield to juries, desiring them to read the papers stated to be a libel as men of common understanding, and say whether in their minds it conveys the idea imputed.' See Woolnoth v. Meadows, 5 East, 463. 1 Hawk. c. 73, s. 5. Re Raed v. Huggonson, 2 Atk. 470, Lord Hardwicke. In Bac. Abr. tit. 'Libel' (A. 3), it is said (in the marginal note) that if an application is made for an information in a case of this kind, some friend to the party complaining should, by affidavit, state the having read the libel, and understanding and believing it to mean the party. See Du Bost v. Beresford, 2 Camp. 512.

on a body of men, though no individuals be pointed out, because such writings have a tendency to inflame and disorder society, and are therefore within the cognisance of the law (o). And scandal published of three or four persons is punishable on the complaint of one or more, or all of them (p).

In R. v. Osborn (q), an information was prayed against the defendant for publishing a paper containing an account of a murder committed upon a Jewish woman and her child, by certain Jews lately arrived from Portugal, and living near Broad Street, because the child was begotten by a Christian (r). It was objected that no information should be granted in this case, because it did not appear who in particular the persons reflected on were (s). But the Court said, that admitting that an information for a libel might be improper, yet the publication of this paper was deservedly punishable on an information for a misdemeanor of the highest kind; such sort of advertisements necessarily tending to raise tumults and disorders amongst the people, and inflame them with a universal spirit of barbarity against a whole body of men, as if guilty of crimes scarcely practicable, and wholly incredible. It is enough to specify some of the individuals affected by the libel; and where it was objected that the names of certain trustees, who were part of the body prosecuting, were not mentioned, Lord Hardwicke observed, that though there were authorities where, in cases of libel upon persons in their private capacities, it had been held necessary that some particular person should be named, this was never carried so far as to make it necessary that every person injured by such libel should be specified (t).

Where a publication stated that, upon the death of Queen Caroline, none of the bells of the several churches of Durham were tolled; and ascribed this omission to the clergy, and then proceeded to make some severe observations on that body, a criminal information was granted (u).

Imputations on the Dead.—There has been some controversy on the question whether and how far an indictment will lie on a libel defamatory of a dead person. Such a libel is not actionable (v). Coke, after speaking of libels against private men and magistrates or public persons, says, ‘although the private man or magistrate be dead at the time of the making of the libel, yet it is punishable: for in the one case it stirs up others of the same family blood or society to revenge or to break the peace, and in the other the libeller traduces and slanders the state and government, which dies not' (w). This dictum is extra-judicial and did not go to the point in judgment in the case in which it is made (x), and according to the latest decisions 'it must be some very unusual publication to justify an indictment or information for aspersing the memory of the dead' (y). The decided cases on this subject are not numerous. In R. v. Paine (z), the libel was on William III. who was living, and Queen Mary II. who was dead. In R. v. Critchley (a), the case arose on a statement made of Sir Charles Nicoll, deceased, who was father-in-law of a Secretary of State that 'he changed his principles for a red ribbon and voted for that pernicious project the Excise.' In R. v. Topham (b), the libel imputed to a deceased peer 'unmanly vices and debaucheries.' In that case it was held that an indictment for libel, reflecting on the memory of a deceased person, cannot be supported, unless it state that it was done with a design to bring contempt on his family, or to stir up the hatred of the King's subjects against his relations, and to induce them to break the peace in vindicating the honour of the family.

In R. v. Hunt (c), the indictment was for publishing Byron's 'Vision of Judgment,' which was alleged to contain imputations on King George III., then deceased.

In R. v. Labouchere (d), the Court refused to grant a criminal information for statements defamatory of a deceased foreign nobleman.

In R. v. Ensor (e), on an indictment for newspaper libel on a political opponent who had been dead for three years, which led to an assault on the defendant by the sons of the deceased, Stephen, J., directed an acquittal on the ground that the libel had no reference to any living person. This ruling in his view was inadequate and he later expressed an opinion that in such a case the libel must be intended and not merely calculated to provoke sorrowing relations (f).

SECT. III.—TRIAL.

By the Quarter Sessions Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 38), sect. 1, Courts of Quarter Sessions for a county or borough have no jurisdiction to try any person for composing, printing, or publishing a defamatory libel.

By sect. 6 of the Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 60), 'Every libel (g) or alleged libel and every offence under this Act shall be deemed to be an offence within the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 17)' (h).

(h) Post, Vol. ii, p. 1926.

The respective functions of judge and jury with respect to the trial of libel are as follows :—

In criminal cases the judge is to define the crime, and the jury are to find whether the party has committed that offence.

The Libel Act, 1792 (32 Geo. III. c. 60) (i), after reciting that ‘doubts have arisen whether on the trial of an indictment or information for the making or publishing any libel where an issue or issues are joined between the King and the defendant or defendants on the plea of not guilty pleaded, it be competent to the jury empanelled to try the same to give their verdict on the whole matter in issue,’ enacts (s. 1) that ‘on every such trial, the jury sworn to try the issue may give a general verdict of guilty or not guilty, upon the whole matter put in issue on such indictment or information; and shall not be required or directed, by the Court or judge before whom such indictment or information shall be tried, to find the defendant or defendants guilty, merely on the proof of the publication by such defendant or defendants of the paper charged to be a libel, and of the sense ascribed to the same in such indictment or information.’ Provided always (s. 2) that on every such trial ‘the Court or judge before whom such indictment or information shall be tried, shall, according to their or his discretion, give their or his opinion and directions to the jury, on the matter in issue between the King and the defendant or defendants, in like manner as in other criminal cases’ (j).

In cases of libel, as in other cases of a criminal nature, it has been the course for a judge first to give a legal definition of the offence, and then to leave it to the jury to say, whether the facts necessary to constitute that offence are proved to their satisfaction. Whether the particular publication, the subject of inquiry, is calculated to injure the reputation of another, by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, is a question of fact for the jury to determine. The judge as a matter of advice to them in deciding that question, may give his own opinion as to the nature of the publication, but is not bound to do so (k).

SECT. IV.—PUNISHMENT.

Common Law.—The judgment in cases of defamatory libel at common law was in the discretion of the Court; and usually consisted of fine, imprisonment without hard labour, and finding sureties to keep the peace (l). Judgment was given on each of four counts of an information that the defendant be imprisoned on the first count ‘for the space of two months now next ensuing’; on the second count, ‘for the further space of (i) Generally known as Fox’s Act. The Act in terms extends to all forms of libel and is not limited to defamation. The Act is said to declare the common law. But prior to its passing it had been in certain cases ruled that the only matters for the jury were publication and the truth of the innuendoes. Parmiter v. Coupland, 6 M. & W. 105, Parke, B. Jenner v. A’Beckett, L. R. 7 Q.B. 11: 41 L. J. Q.B. 14. See Erskine’s speeches in the case of the Dean of St. Asaph, Ridgway’s Col. vol. i. pp. 234, 264.

(j) S. 3 provides that the jury may find a special verdict, in their discretion, as in other criminal cases. By s. 4, defendants found guilty may move in arrest of judgment as before the passing of the Act.

two months, to be computed from and after the end and expiration of his imprisonment' for the offence mentioned in the first count; on the third count, for the further space of two months, to be computed in like manner from the end of the imprisonment on the second count; and on the fourth count, for the further space of two months, to be computed in like manner from the end of the imprisonment on the third count. The third count was adjudged on error to be insufficient: but it was held, that the sentence on the fourth count was not thereby invalidated, and that the imprisonment on it was to be computed from the end of the imprisonment on the second count (m).

Statutory Punishments.—The Libel Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96), now regulates the punishment of persons publishing or threatening to publish defamatory libels.

Sect. 3 (Threats to Publish) is dealt with under 'Robbery and Threats,' post, Vol. ii. p. 1158.

Sect. 4. 'If any person shall maliciously publish any defamatory libel knowing the same to be false, every such person, being convicted thereof, shall be liable to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction for any term not exceeding two years, and to pay such fine as the Court shall award.'

Sect. 5. 'If any person shall maliciously publish any defamatory libel, every such person, being convicted thereof, shall be liable to fine or imprisonment or both, as the Court may award, such imprisonment not to exceed the term of one year.'

The Court may also or alternatively put the offender under recognisances to keep the peace and be of good behaviour, or deal with the case under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907 (n).

Sects. 4 and 5 do not create any new offence nor alter the nature of the offence of defamatory libel as defined by the common law, but merely limit the punishment for the common law offence in the two cases with which they deal (o).

On an indictment for publishing a defamatory libel knowing it to be false (s. 4), the defendant may be convicted of publishing a defamatory libel without the scienter, sect. 5 (p).

Costs.—As to costs, see post, Vol. ii. pp. 2039, 2042.

SECT. V.—INDICTMENT.

The only matter now essential to be stated in an indictment (q) for defamatory libel are that the defendant unlawfully published of and concerning (r) a named person (s) or a specified body of persons (t) certain defamatory matter which must be set out according to its tenor (u), with such averments of extrinsic facts (v) and innuendoes as may be necessary to indicate its defamatory meaning and its reference to the person or class defamed (w). In some of the older cases the words 'composed' and 'printed' are added to 'published' (x); neither of these words is necessary, the gist of the offence being publication and not the composition (y) or printing.

It is usual to insert the words 'falsely and maliciously.' But 'falsely' is certainly superfluous (z) and omission of the word 'maliciously,' if a defect, is not covered by verdict (a). To justify punishment under sect. 4 of the Libel Act, 1843 (b), it must be averred and proved that the defendant knew the defamatory words to be false.

It is not essential even when the only publication intended to be proved is to the person defamed to state that the words were intended or calculated to cause a breach of the peace (c).

The proper conclusion is 'against the peace, &c.,' the provisions of sects. 4-5 of the Libel Act, 1843 (d) not having affected the common law definition of the offence and merely prescribing the punishment according as the scienter is or is not proved (e).

The words alleged to be defamatory should, as already stated, be set out according to their tenor (f), and with accuracy, and with care not to charge as continuous statements, statements which were in fact separated by intervening matter (g). This care is necessary to avoid variance between indictment and proof as to the words or sense and the risk that the Court might be unable or unwilling to amend under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 1 (h).

Libel in Foreign Languages.—If the libel is in a foreign language it is necessary that it should be set forth in the indictment in the original language, and also in an English translation, to prove the translation to be correct (i).

Innuendoes.—Innuendoes are inserted to fix and point the defamatory meaning of the words and their reference to the person said to be defamed, and they may not add new matter (j).

It is the duty of a judge to say whether a publication is capable of the meaning ascribed to it by an innuendo; but when the judge is satisfied of that, it must be left to the jury to say whether the publication has the meaning so ascribed to it (k).

Where written or printed matter is clearly defamatory of a particular person no statement of intrinsic circumstances, by way of inducement, is necessary (l). It is no objection, therefore, that words are not explained by an innuendo where they are commonly enough understood in a defamatory sense to warrant a jury in so applying them (m); and in such a case, innuendoes improperly enlarging the sense may be rejected as surplusage after verdict (n); for on motion in arrest of judgment, an innuendo which is not warranted by the words themselves nor properly connected with them by prefatory matter, may be rejected (o). But the case would be different if the words were capable of two senses, and the innuendo ascribed one meaning to them, and was good on the face of it (p). If there be contained in the alleged libel matter which is capable of receiving the interpretation put upon it by an innuendo, there is no fault in the count for not having explanatory averments to fix and point the libel. But generally if the words written or spoken cannot apply to the individual, no previous averments or subsequent innuendoes can help to give the words an application which they have not. 'Suppose the words to be, "a murder was committed in A.'s house last night," no introduction can warrant the innuendo "meaning that B. committed the said murder," nor would it be helped by the finding of the jury for the plaintiff. For the Court must see that the words do not and cannot mean it, and would arrest the judgment accordingly' (q). But if an innuendo ascribes to certain words a particular meaning which cannot be supported in evidence, the innuendo, if well pleaded in form, cannot be repudiated on the trial, so as to let in proof that the words have another meaning (r). If words are laid to be uttered with intent to convey a particular meaning to persons present, it must be proved that the party uttering them had that meaning, and that they were so understood by the hearers (s).

Where a count alleged that the defendant, intending to defame the Duke of Brunswick, published a libel containing divers false and malicious matters and things of and concerning the said duke, that is to say: We should think that no lady would admit to her society such a crack-brained scamp as the Duke of Brunswick (meaning the said duke), the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that these averments shewed sufficiently without more formal introduction, that the libel was of and concerning the duke (t).

(t) Gregory v. R., 15 Q.B. 957. In the same case 15 Q.B. 974, a count was held bad which suggested that certain words meant that the Duke was suspected of a crime which would bring him into danger of his life by the Court of England on the ground it did not shew in what manner the life of the duke would be endangered.

against the government of the realm, and to cause it to be believed that divers subjects had been inhumanly killed by certain troops of the King, published a libel of and concerning the government of this realm, and of and concerning the said troops, which libel stated, that the defendant saw with abhorrence, in the newspapers, the accounts of a transaction at Manchester, and alleged that unarmed and unresisting men had been inhumanly cut down by the dragoons (meaning the said troops), and then commented strongly upon this being the use of a standing army, and called upon the people to demand justice, &c. ; but it did not, in terms, say, that the dragoons acted under the authority or orders of the government. After conviction, a motion was made in arrest of judgment, on the ground that it did not sufficiently appear that the libel was written of and concerning the government, nor of or concerning what troops it was written : but the Court held, that it was obvious, from its whole tenor and import, that it meant to cast imputations upon the government ; that it was a libel to impute crime to any of the King's troops, though it did not define what troops in particular were referred to ; and that the innuendo of 'the said troops' meant the undefined part of those troops (u).

Venue.—The libel must also be proved to have been published by the accused, in the county laid in the indictment (v). By 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 12 (w), an offence begun in one county and completed in another is triable in either, and at common law, if a man writes a libel in one county and procures its publication in another, he is triable in the latter county (x). So if a man writes a libel in London, and sends it by post addressed to a person in Exeter, he is guilty of a publication in Exeter (y). And where the defendant wrote a libel in Leicestershire, with intent to publish it in Middlesex, and published it in Middlesex accordingly, and the information against him was in Leicestershire, Abbott, C.J., and Holroyd and Best, JJ., held the information right (z). From the same case it appears to have been considered that delivering a libel sealed, in order that it may be opened and published by a third person in a distant county, is a publication in the county in which it is so delivered : and further, that if delivering it open were essential, proof that the defendant wrote it in county A., and that C. delivered it unsealed to D. in county B., would be prima facie evidence that the defendant delivered it open to C., in the county A., though there be no evidence of C.'s having been in county A. about the time ; or that application had been made to D. to know of whom he received it. The information was for writing and publishing a libel in the county of Leicester, and it was proved by the date of the letter that the defendant wrote it in that county, and that A. delivered it to B., for publication in the county of Middlesex, it being then unsealed. A. was not called as a witness ; and there was no evidence of his having been in the county of Leicester, or how the libel came to him. The jury were told that as A. had it open, they might presume that he received it open ; and that, as the defendant wrote it in the county of Leicester it might be presumed that A. received it in that county; and three judges held against the opinion of Bayley, J., that this direction was proper; and they also held that if the delivering open could not be presumed, a delivery sealed with a view to and for the purpose of publication was a publication; and they thought there was sufficient ground for presuming some delivery, either open or sealed, in the county of Leicester (a). It appears from this case that the dating a libel at a particular place is evidence of its having been written at that place (b). The postmarks upon a letter are prima facie but not conclusive evidence that the letter was in the office to which the postmarks belong at the date thereby specified (c). If the envelopes have been destroyed fresh evidence of the postmark is admissible (d). If a libellous letter is sent by the post, addressed to a party at a place out of the county in which the venue is laid in an indictment for the libel, yet, if it were first received by him within that county, it is a sufficient publication to support the indictment (e). Owing the signature to a libel is no evidence in what county it was signed. This was held in the case of the Seven Bishops (f); but additional evidence being afterwards given that the bishops applied to the Lord President of the Council about delivering a petition to the King and that they were admitted to the King for that purpose in Middlesex, the case was left to the jury (g).

SECT. VI.—EVIDENCE.

Evidence for the Prosecution.—Where no plea of justification has been filed it is usually sufficient for the prosecution to prove publication of the defamatory libel by or at the instance of the defendant and within the jurisdiction of the Court of trial and to produce and read the libel, and to prove if need be any innuendoes or averments of intrinsic facts necessary to shew the defamatory character of the publication and its reference to the persons charged to be defamed, and also, if the libel is framed on 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 4 (h), that the defendant knew the defamatory matter to be false. If the libel has merely been exhibited to know to whom letters should be directed, to which an answer was returned in the register. After this the publisher received two letters in the same handwriting directed as mentioned, and having the Irish postmarks on the envelopes, which two letters were proved to be in the handwriting of the defendant, the previous letter having been destroyed. It was held that this was a sufficient ground for the Court to have the letters read; and the letters themselves containing expressions of the writer, indicative of his having sent them to the publisher of the register in Middlesex for the purpose of publication, the whole was evidence sufficient for the jury to find a publication in Middlesex by the procurement of the defendant.

by the defendant, and he refuses on the trial to produce it, after receiving 'notice to produce,' parol evidence may be given of its contents (i).

Publication.—To constitute the offence it is essential to prove publication (j). The mere writing or composing of a defamatory libel by anyone which is neither circulated or read to others, will not render him civilly, nor, it would seem, criminally responsible; nor will he be held to have published the paper, if it be delivered out of his study by his own or his servants' mistake (k), or pass out of his possession or control by accident, or some cause independent of his volition.

It is not publication of a libel to take a copy which is not published (l). But it is no defence to shew that the libel published was copied from another publication even if published as a copy and the name of the original author stated (m), but a person who has written a libel which is afterwards published will be considered as the maker of it, unless he can rebut the presumption of law by shewing another to be the author, or prove the act to be innocent in himself (n). For as said by Holt, C.J., if a libel appears under a man's handwriting, and no other author is known, he is taken in the mainour (o) and it turns the proof upon him; and if he cannot produce the composer, it is hard to find that he is not

(k) R. v. Paine, 5 Mod. 167. 'As regards criminal libels there are weighty dicta to the effect that composing is an offence without publication.' In R. v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 95, Lord Tenterden said: 'The composition of a treasonable paper intended for publication, has, on more than one occasion, been held an overt act of high treason, although the actual publication had been intercepted or prevented, and I have heard nothing on the present occasion to convince my mind that one who composes or writes a libel with intent to defame, may not, under any circumstances, be punished, if the libel be not published.' Holroyd, J., said: 'Where a misdemeanor has been committed by writing and publishing a libel, the writing of such a libel so published is in my opinion criminal, and liable to be punished by the law of England as a misdemeanor, as well as the publishing of it.' And again, 'The composing and writing, with intent and for the purpose above stated, of a libel proved to have been published by the defendant, is in my opinion of itself a misdemeanor, in whatever county the publishing of it took place.' Upon the principle that an act done, and a criminal intention joined to that act, are sufficient to constitute a crime it should seem that writing a libel with intent to defame is a crime. C. S. G. But in Maloney v. Bartley, 3 Camp. 210, Wood, B., held, on the trial of an action for libel, in the shape of an extrajudicial affidavit sworn before a magistrate, that a person who acted as a magistrate's clerk was not bound to answer whether by the defendant's orders he wrote the affidavit, and delivered it to the magistrate, as he might thereby criminate himself.

(o) A man was taken with the mainour, when he was taken with the thing stolen in his possession, or, as it was termed in the ancient indictments, captus cum manu opere, and when so taken he might be brought into Court, arraigned, and tried without a grand jury. 2 Hale, 148. Some lords of manors had jurisdiction to try such cases; for I have the record of such an indictment for horse stealing, tried in the Court of Leek, Staffordshire (35 Edw. I.) the very man (p). Where the manuscript of a seditious libel was in the handwriting of the defendant, and a printer had printed five hundred copies from it, three hundred of which had been posted about Birmingham, but there was no evidence to connect the defendant with the printing or the posting, except the handwriting, it was held, that there was evidence to go to the jury that it was published by the defendant (q).

Where, in an action for libel contained in a pamphlet, a witness proved that the defendant gave her a pamphlet, and that she read parts of it, and that she had lent it to several persons, and it was returned to her, but she could not swear the copy produced was the same pamphlet the defendant gave her, but it was an exact copy, if it was not the same, and she believed it to be the same, it was held that this was sufficient evidence to be left to the jury (r).

The reading of a libel in the presence of another, without previous knowledge of its being a libel, or the laughing at a libel read by another, or the saying that such a libel is made by J. S., whether spoken with or without malice, does not amount to a publication of the libel. And he who repeats part of a libel in merriment, without any malice or purpose of defamation, is not punishable (s). In an action for a libel contained in a caricature print, where the witness stated, that having heard that the defendant had a copy of this print, he went to his house and requested liberty to see it, and that the defendant thereupon produced it, and pointed out the figure of the plaintiff and the other persons it ridiculed, Lord Ellenborough, C.J., ruled that this was not sufficient evidence of publication to support the action (t).

In criminal cases it is not essential as in civil cases of defamatory libel to prove publication to a person other than the person defamed (u).

Proof that the libel was contained in a letter directed to the party, and delivered into the party's hands, is sufficient proof of publication (v). And delivering a libel sealed, in order that it may be opened and published by a third person in a distant county, is a publication (w). The production of a letter containing a libel with the seal broken, and the postmark on it, is prima facie evidence of publication (x).

All persons concerned in any capacity in the publication or circulation of a defamatory libel or in causing or procuring its publication are liable as principals (y) unless the part taken by them was lawful (z), or innocent, or purely accidental (a).

It is usual in the indictment to charge the defendant with having 'published and caused or procured to be published' the libel in question (b).

According to the older books it is not material whether he who disperses a libel knew anything of the contents or effects of it or not, for that nothing would be more easy than to publish the most virulent papers with the greatest security, if the concealing the purport of them from an illiterate publisher would make him safe in dispersing them (c).

This opinion must be read subject to qualification, for a messenger who cannot read, or the carrier of a sealed or closed parcel who has no knowledge of the defamatory nature of its contents, cannot be held criminally responsible for publication (d). The disseminator is not liable unless conscious of the contents (e) or unless he has notice of their nature putting him on inquiry (f). But printers can rarely rely on this defence (g). Evidence is of course admissible to prove innocence of the nature of the libel. Thus, where an action was brought against a porter for a libel contained in a handbill, which he had delivered tied up in a paper parcel, evidence was admitted that he delivered the parcel in the course of his business without any knowledge of its contents (h).

In such cases the criminal responsibility rests on the person who employs the innocent agent (i).

The defendant was indicted for causing to be published in a newspaper a libel which told a story of the prosecutor, and added comments on the story, giving it a ludicrous character. The editor of the newspaper stated that the defendant had expressed a wish to him that he would 'shew up' the prosecutor, and had told him the story. The witness communicated it to a reporter for the paper, and the libel was substantially what was so communicated. Before the publication the defendant remarked to the witness that the article had not yet appeared. After it had appeared, the defendant told the witness that he had seen it, and that he liked it very much. The witness had heard the story before the defendant told it him. It was held, that on this evidence the jury might find that the defendant authorised the publication of this particular libel, notwithstanding the comments added, as there were both a general authority to publish, and an approval of the particular publication (j).

Where a reporter to a newspaper proved that he had given a written statement to the editor of the paper, the contents of which had been communicated to him by the defendant for the purpose of such publication, and that the newspaper then produced was exactly the same, with the exception of some slight alterations, not affecting the sense; it was held, that what the reporter published, in consequence of what passed with the defendant, might be considered as published by the defendant; but that the newspaper could not be read without producing the written account delivered by the reporter to the editor (k).

In an action for libel the plaintiff complained of the publication in certain newspapers of reports of the proceedings of a board of guardians, containing defamatory statements concerning himself. At the meeting at which the proceedings in question took place, reporters were present in the discharge of their duty as representatives of newspapers. One of the defendants was chairman of the meeting, and the other was present and took part in the proceedings. The latter said that he hoped the local press would take notice of 'this scandalous case,' and requested the chairman to give an account of it. This he accordingly did, and in the course of his statement said, 'I am glad gentlemen of the press are in the room, and I hope they will take notice of it.' The other defendant thereupon said, 'And so do I.' The reports complained of were afterwards inserted in the newspapers, being somewhat condensed, but substantially correct, accounts of what had been said at the meeting. These reports were set out in the declaration, and constituted the libels complained of. The judge at the trial directed a verdict for the defendants, on the ground that there was no evidence of a publication by the defendants of these libels, to which direction the plaintiff excepted. Held (by Keating, Montague Smith, and Hannen, JJ., diss. Byles and Mellor, JJ.), that the direction was wrong, and that there was evidence for the jury (l).

'I have no doubt that a man who employs another generally to write a libel must take his chance of what appears, though something may be added which he did not state.'

(l) Parkes v. Prescott, L. R. 4 Ex. 169, 179: 38 L. J. Ex. 105. Montague Smith, J., in delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court, said: 'In the result, I come to the conclusion that, on principle it is correct to hold that, where a man makes a request to another to publish defamatory matter, of which, for the purpose, he gives him a statement, whether in full or in outline, and the agent publishes the matter, adhering to the sense and substance of it, although the language be to some extent his own, the man making the request is liable to an action as the publisher. If the law were otherwise, it would, in many cases, throw a shield over those who are the real authors of libels, and who seek to defame others under what would then be the safe shelter of intermediate agents. I make this observation only with reference to the general consequences which would result from the arguments relied on to sustain the defendant's contention.'

if he had not also seen the letters, and that he understood the passage in the placard to allude to the letters, it was held that the letters were admissible without proving who wrote or sent them, as the placard referred to them, and would not be intelligible without them, and that a defendant, who refers to other papers in his publication, must submit to have them read as explanatory of such publication (m).

If the handwriting of the defamatory matter is in dispute it may be compared with genuine writing of the defendant. See 28 & 29 Vict. c. 18, ss. 1, 8 (post, Vol. ii. p. 2150).

As to the admissibility of depositions taken under the Indictable Offences Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42), and the use of gazettes, proclamations, &c., in evidence, see post, Bk. xiii. c. iv. and p. 2120.

Malice and Intent.—It is not necessary to prove malice unless the occasion is privileged or the defence of fair comment is raised (n). In such cases the evidence must go to shew express malice (o).

The criminal intention of the defendant will be matter of inference from the nature of the publication. Where a libellous publication appears unexplained by any evidence, the jury should judge from the overt act; and, where the publication contains a charge defamatory in its nature, should from thence infer that the intention was malicious (p). It is a general rule that an act unlawful in itself, and injurious to another, is considered in law to be done malo animo towards the person injured; and this is all that is meant by a charge of malice in an indictment or statement of claim for defamatory libel, which is introduced rather to exclude the supposition that the publication may have been made on some innocent occasion than for any other purpose (q), and is not essential in an indictment (r). The intention may be collected from the libel, unless the mode of publication, or other circumstances explain it; and the publisher must be presumed to intend what the publication is likely to produce; so that if it is likely to excite sedition, he must be presumed to have intended that it should have that effect (s). Publishing what is a libel without excuse is indictable, though the publisher be free from what in common parlance is called malice; for defaming wilfully without excuse is in law malicious. And even if it could be an excuse, that the publisher believed what he published to be true, it is not so if he professes to publish it from authority. A newspaper contained this paragraph: ‘the malady under which his Majesty labours is of an alarming nature [meaning insanity]; it is from authority we speak.’ At the trial of the indictment for this publication, the jury asked if a malicious intention were necessary to constitute a libel; to which Abbott, C.J., answered, that a man must have intended to do what his act was calculated to effect; and the jury found the defendant guilty. Upon a motion for a new trial it was admitted that the paragraph was libellous, but it was urged that malice was essential to make the defendant criminal; that he believed the King to have been so afflicted, and that the answer to the question by the jury was incorrect. But the Court thought otherwise, as the defendant must know whether he spoke from authority, and could have proved it; and if malice were a question of fact, a man must be presumed to have intended to produce the effect which his act will naturally produce; and libelling without excuse is legal malice (t). A person who publishes matter injurious to the character of another must be considered, in point of law, to have intended the consequences resulting from that act (u), for every man must be presumed to intend the natural and ordinary consequences of his own act (v). The judge, therefore, ought not to leave it as a question to the jury, whether the defendant intended to injure the person libelled, but whether the tendency of the publication was injurious to such person (w). In some cases, however, the paper or other matter may be libellous only with reference to circumstances which should be laid before the jury by evidence.

In order to shew the existence of actual malice in the mind of the writer of a libel, other libels by him, whether written previously or subsequently, are admissible in evidence (x). Where the House of Lords asked the judges 'in an action for defamatory libel, when the plea of the general issue is pleaded, and also a plea under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 1, denying actual malice, and stating the publication of an apology set forth in the plea, is it admissible upon a trial for the plaintiff to give evidence of other publications by the defendant (some of them more than six years before the publication complained of) of and concerning the plaintiff, in order to prove malice against the defendant?' the judges answered, 'We are all of opinion that, under such a plea, the publication of the previous libels on the plaintiff by the defendant is admissible evidence to shew that the defendant wrote the libel in question with actual malice against the plaintiff. A long practice of libelling the plaintiff may shew in the most satisfactory manner that the defendant was actuated by malice in the particular publication, and that it did not take place through carelessness or inadvertence; and the more the evidence approaches to the proof of a systematic practice, the more convincing it is. The circumstance that the other libels are more or less frequent, or more or less remote from the time of the publication of that in question, merely affects the weight, not the admissibility of the evidence.' And the House of Lords held accordingly (y).

Where an information for libel alleged that a person unknown murdered E. G., and that one H. had been arrested on the charge of committing the murder and discharged, and the libel set out spoke of 'the acquittal of H. for the murder of E. by the name of E. G., and that this last fact might be proved by the coroner, and that he might for this purpose use an inquisition drawn up on paper (z).

Where a declaration for libel set out the following passage: 'We would suggest to the ex-Duke of Brunswick the propriety of withdrawing into his own natural and sinister obscurity' (meaning thereby to insinuate that the plaintiff was guilty of unnatural practices), Lord Campbell, C.J., refused to permit a witness to be asked if he had read the libel, and what he understood by the word 'natural' printed in italics, as it was for the jury to form their own opinion as to what was meant by the word so printed (a).

In an action for libel it appeared that the plaintiff, an attorney, was employed by one N. to bring an action against an executor; and that the defendant who was employed to adjust the executor's accounts, finding that an action was about to be commenced against the executor, wrote a letter to N. blaming him for allowing the plaintiff to sue, and containing this passage, 'If you will be misled by an attorney, who only considers his own interest, you will have to repent it; you may think when you have once ordered your attorney to write to Mr. G., he would not do any more without your further orders; but if you once set him about it, he will go any length without further orders.' It was held that the question whether this letter applied to the plaintiff individually, or to the profession at large, was properly left to the jury (b).

SECT. VII.—MATTERS OF DEFENCE.

The defences to an indictment for defamatory libel are: (1) that the words were not published by the defendant; (2) that they do not refer to the person of whom they are alleged to be published; (3) that they are not defamatory; (4) that if published they are (a) absolutely privileged (c), or (b) conditionally privileged and published without express malice (d); (5) that if published they are in the nature of fair comment or criticism (e); (6) that they are true in substance and in fact and published for the public benefit (f). All these defences except the last may be set up under a plea of not guilty. The last must be set up by special plea. Under the plea of not guilty the defendant is entitled to prove that there was no publication or that he was not responsible for it, and to shew that the alleged libel does not relate to or does not defame the person to whom it is alleged to refer, and to prove privilege absolute or qualified, or fair comment.

Publication.—'The publication of a libel when prosecuted as a criminal offence was at common law treated upon an exceptional principle and with exceptional severity (g). The maxim "respondeat superior," which, with rare exceptions founded on reasons not applicable to libel, and which

(g) Libel was thus an exception from the 'distinction between the authority which will make a man liable criminally and that which will make him liable civilly for the acts of another.' Parkes v. Prescott, L. R. 4 Ex. 169: 38 L. J. Ex. 105, Byles, J.

I will presently notice (h), pertains to civil liability only, was applied to an indictment for libel, and the proprietor of a newspaper in which a libellous article had been inserted was held to be criminally as well as civilly responsible for it, though he had never authorised it nor had anything to do with its insertion and whether the editor had inserted it by negligence or wilfully' (i).

In accordance with this rule, proof of the purchase of a book or paper containing defamatory matter, in a bookseller's shop, was held prima facie evidence of publication by the master, although it did not appear that he knew of any such book being there, or what the contents thereof were, and though he was not upon the premises, and had been kept away for a long time by illness; the Court would not presume that it was obtained and sold there by a stranger, and held that the master must, if he suggested anything of this kind in his excuse, prove it (j). So the proprietor of a newspaper was held answerable, criminally as well as civilly, for the acts of his servants in the publication of a libel, although it could be shewn that such publication was without the privity of the proprietor (k); for a person who derives profit from, and who furnishes means for, carrying on the concern, and entrusts the conduct of the publication to one whom he selects, and in whom he confides, was presumed to cause to be published what actually appeared, and ought to be answerable, although it could not be shewn that he was individually concerned in the particular publication (l); and these were acts done in the course of the trade or business carried on by the proprietor.

But there were cases in which the presumption arising from the proprietorship of a paper might be rebutted by evidence in exculpation or contradictory (m). Thus in an action for a libel, where it appeared upon the evidence that the defendant, a tradesman, was accustomed to employ his daughter to write his bills and letters; that a customer, to whom a bill written by the daughter had been sent by the daughter, sent it back on the ground of the charge being too high, and that the bill was afterwards returned to the customer, inclosed in a letter also written by the defendant's daughter, and being a libel upon the plaintiff, who had inspected and reduced the bill for the customer; it was held that this was not sufficient evidence to go to a jury, either of command, authority, adoption, or recognition by the defendant (n).

The rigour of the common law was mitigated by sect. 7 of the Libel Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96), which enacts that 'Whosoever, upon the trial of any indictment or information for the publication of a libel, under the plea of not guilty, evidence shall have been given which shall establish a presumptive case of publication against the defendant by the act of any other person by his authority, it shall be competent to such defendant to prove that such publication was made without his authority, consent, or knowledge, and that the said publication did not arise from want of due care or caution on his part' (o).

This section is not limited to newspapers. 'It applies to any printed or written slander, whether contained in a newspaper, book, bill, or letter. What it deals with is the libel, nothing more' (p). Nor does it say what is the effect of proving the negative: 'but there can be as little doubt that it means it to be an entire defence entitling the defendant to a verdict and not merely to a mitigation of punishment' (q). The effect of the section as regards newspapers is to make the existence of an authority by the proprietor to the editor to publish libels no longer a presumption of law, but a question of fact. Under the former law the only question of fact was whether the proprietor authorised the publication of the newspaper; under the section it is whether he authorised the publication of the particular libel. Though production of the newspaper containing the libel with proof that he is owner raises a prima facie case of responsibility, he may under sect. 7 displace this case by appropriate evidence, and the jury are to be directed that criminal intention is not to be presumed, and that the general authority to an editor to conduct a newspaper is not per se evidence that the owner authorised or consented to the publication by the editor of a libel in the paper (r).

It is not open to the defendant to prove that a paper similar to that, for the publication of which he is prosecuted, was published on a former occasion by other persons, who have never been prosecuted for it (s). Where the alleged libel was contained in a newspaper, it was held that the defendant had a right to have read in evidence any extract from the same paper, connected with the subject of the passage charged as libellous, although disjointed from it by extraneous matter, and printed in a different character (t). This rule is of general application so far as the context or other matter in the same publication qualifies or explains the matter charged as defamatory.

1. Absolute Privilege.

Petitions to the King.—A petition to the King to be relieved from doing what the King has directed the party to do, if made bona fide and in respectful terms, is not punishable, though it call in question the legality of the King's direction. James II. published a declaration of liberty of conscience and worship to all his subjects, dispensing with the oaths and tests prescribed by statutes of Charles II. (25 Car. II. c. 2, and 30 Car. II. st. 2) (u), and directed that it should be read two days in every church and chapel in the realm, and that the bishops should distribute it in their dioceses that it might be so read. The Archbishop of Canterbury and six bishops presented a petition to the King praying that he would not insist upon their distributing and reading it, principally because it was founded on such a dispensing power as had often been declared illegal in Parliament, and that they could not in prudence, honour, or conscience, so far make themselves parties to it as to distribute and publish it. This petition was treated as a libel : they were taken up and tried for it. The publication was proved ; and Wright, C.J., and Allibone, J., thought it a libel : but Holloway and Powell, JJ., thought otherwise, there not being an ill intention of sedition in the bishops, and the object of their petition being to free themselves from blame in not complying with the King's command (v).

Statements made in a petition to Parliament or to a committee (w) of either House are absolutely privileged (x).

Proceedings in Parliament.—The members of the two Houses of Parliament, by reason of their privilege (y), are not answerable in law for any personal reflections on individuals contained in speeches in their respective Houses ; for policy requires that those who are by the constitution appointed to provide for the safety and welfare of the public, should, in the execution of their high functions, be wholly uninfluenced by private considerations (z).

The same privilege attaches to evidence given before committees (a). This form of privilege is limited to what is published in Parliament, and does not apply to republication outside (z), except perhaps to bona fide publication by a member for the information of his constituents (b).

Reports of Proceedings in Parliament.—The publication of a report of a debate in either House of Parliament is not absolutely privileged : but if it be accurate the publisher is not responsible for defamatory statements made in the course of the debate so reported and published (c), or for the publication of articles fairly commenting upon the debate so reported and published (d).

This privilege is extended to the publication in newspapers in the case of fair and accurate reports of the proceedings of a select committee of either House unless published maliciously (e).

This privilege will be destroyed by proof of express malice (f).

Parliamentary Publications.—The Parliamentary Papers Act, 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 9) (g), after reciting, 'whereas it is essential to the due and effectual exercise and discharge of the functions and duties of Parliament, and to the promotion of wise legislation, that no obstructions or impediments should exist to the publication of such of the reports, papers, votes, or proceedings of either House of Parliament as such House of Parliament may deem fit or necessary to be published: And whereas obstructions or impediments to such publication have arisen, and hereafter may arise, by means of civil or criminal proceedings being taken against persons employed by or acting under the authority of the Houses of Parliament, or one of them, in the publication of such reports, papers, votes, or proceedings; by reason and for remedy whereof it is expedient that more speedy protection should be afforded to all persons acting under the authority aforesaid, and that all such civil or criminal proceedings should be summarily put an end to and determined in manner hereinafter mentioned:' enacts (sect. 1) that 'it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons who now is or are, or hereafter shall be, a defendant or defendants in any civil or criminal proceeding commenced or prosecuted in any manner soever, for or on account or in respect of the publication of any such report, paper, votes, or proceedings by such person or persons, or by his, her, or their servant or servants, by or under the authority of that we are disposed to agree with what was said in Davison v. Dunoan, 7 E. & B. 232, as to such a speech being privileged if bona fide published by a member for the information of his constituents. But whatever would deprive a report of the proceedings in a Court of justice of immunity will equally apply to a report of proceedings in Parliament. We pass on to the second branch of this rule, which has reference to alleged misdirection in respect of the second count of the declaration, which is founded on the article in the Times, commenting on the debate in the House of Lords; and the conduct of the plaintiff in preferring the petition which gave rise to it. We are of opinion that the direction given to the jury was perfectly correct. The publication of the debate having been justifiable, the jury were properly told that the subject was, for the reasons we have already adverted to, pre-eminently one of public interest, and therefore one on which public comment and observation might properly be made; and that consequently the occasion was privileged in the absence of malice. As to the latter, the jury were told that they must be satisfied that the article was an honest and fair comment on the facts; in other words, that, in the first place, they must be satisfied that the comments had been made with an honest belief in their justice; but that this was not enough, inasmuch as such belief might originate in the blindness of party zeal, or in personal or political aversion, that a person taking upon himself publicly to criticise and to condemn the conduct or motives of another must bring to the task not only an honest sense of justice, but also a reasonable degree of judgment and moderation, so that the result may be what a jury shall deem under the circumstances of the case a fair and legitimate criticism on the conduct and motives of the party who is the object of censure. It is immaterial whether the statement is made by a person sitting in a judicial capacity (k), or by jurors (l), advocate (m), party (n), or witness (o), and the privilege extends to proceedings to swear articles of the peace or ex parte applications to a court of justice (p).

The privilege extends to the pleadings and documents created or used for the purpose of the proceedings. Thus where the defendant, in an affidavit filed in Court, said that the plaintiff in a former affidavit against the defendant had sworn falsely, the Court held that this was not libellous; for in every dispute in a court of justice, where one by affidavit charges a thing and the other denies it, the charges must be contradictory, and there must be affirmation of falsehood (q).

And the calendars of prisoners for trial at assizes or quarter sessions, and the cause lists are within the privilege (r).

The privilege has been held to extend to reports by an official receiver, in execution of his duties under the Companies Winding-up Act, 1890 (s).

The privilege is not a privilege to be malicious but a privilege that statements in judicial inquiries should be exempt from any inquiry whether they were prompted by malice or not, it being for the public interest that such statements should be made without any apprehension of subsequent legal proceedings (t).

Reports and Acts of State Officials.—Absolute privilege also attaches to certain classes of communications made by a state official in advising the Crown, or by one official to another, whether superior or equal in rank, in pursuance of official duty (u), and to official notifications of matters of state concern (v). As regards publication of such notices in newspapers see 51 & 52 Vict. c. 64, s. 4, post, p. 1049.

Statements made in the courts of proceedings of military and naval tribunals, whether strictly judicial or not, seem to be in the same position, as statements in ordinary judicial proceedings, on grounds of public policy and convenience: the object being to secure the free and fearless discharge of high public duty, the administration of justice and the maintenance of military discipline on which the welfare and safety of the State depends (w). taken to distinguish between the privilege which protects such reports and communications from being put in evidence and the immunity from legal proceedings in respect of the statements contained in the reports. It is not satisfactorily settled how far the ordinary Courts can enter into inquiries as to the acts of officials in military and naval matters (x).

Where an action was brought against the president of a military court of inquiry for a libel contained in the minutes of the court, delivered by the defendant to the commander-in-chief and deposited in his office, it was held that these minutes were a privileged communication, and that neither the original nor a copy could be put in evidence in proof of the alleged libel (y). And where a court-martial, after stating in their sentence the acquittal of an officer against whom a charge had been preferred, subjoined thereto a declaration of their opinion, that the charge was malicious and groundless, and that the conduct of the prosecutor in falsely calumniating the accused was highly injurious to the service, it was held that the president of the court-martial was not liable to an action for a libel for having delivered such sentence and declaration to the judge-advocate; and Sir James Mansfield, C.J., said: 'If it appear that the charges are absolutely without foundation, is the president of the court-martial to remain perfectly silent on the conduct of the prosecutor, or can it be any offence for him to state that the charge is groundless and malicious?' (z).

Where it was reported that the plaintiff, an officer in the army, had made charges against his brother officers, the commander-in-chief directed that a Court of inquiry should be assembled to inquire into the matter and report thereon to the commander-in-chief. A Court was held, at which the defendant, an officer in the army, was required to attend as a witness. He gave his evidence viva voce, and also handed in a paper containing in substance a repetition of his evidence, with some additions upon the subject, and this paper was received by the Court. A report was made by the Court to the commander-in-chief. The plaintiff unsuccessfully applied for a court-martial upon the defendant for this conduct, and then brought an action against the defendant, in respect of the written paper as a libel, and in respect of the viva voce evidence as slander. It was at the trial ruled that the action would not lie if the verbal and written statements complained of were made by the defendant, being a military officer, in the course of a military inquiry in relation to the conduct of the plaintiff, he being also a military officer, and with reference to the subject of the inquiry, although the defendant had acted mala fide, and with actual malice, and without any reasonable and probable cause, and even if with knowledge that the statement made and handed in by him as aforesaid was false. On appeal it was held that this ruling was correct, and that the evidence of the defendant was mostly part of the minutes of the proceedings of the Court, which, when reported and delivered to the commander-in-chief, was received and held by him on behalf of the sovereign, and as such was inadmissible in evidence (a).

The production of documents of this tenor at a trial could in most cases be resisted on the ground that their disclosure would be against the public interest.

2. Qualified Privilege.

A qualified privilege attaches to protect publication of certain kinds of defamatory statements. The matters thus protected sub modo fall into two classes : (a) reports of certain kinds of proceedings ; (b) what are described as statements made on a privileged occasion.

The underlying principle on which the qualified privilege is recognised is the common convenience and welfare of society, not the convenience of individuals as a class (b).

Proceedings in Parliament.—The reports of the proceedings of either House of Parliament or of their committees, are privileged, vide ante, p. 1042 and post, p. 1049, if fair and accurate, and published without malice.

Reports of Judicial Proceedings.—By sect. 3 (c) of the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 64), ‘a fair and accurate report (d) in any newspaper (e) of proceedings publicly heard before any court exercising judicial authority shall, if published contemporaneously with such proceedings, be privileged : Provided that nothing in this section shall authorise the publication of any blasphemous or indecent matter’ (f).

This enactment, being limited to newspapers, leaves the common law untouched as to the publication of reports of judicial proceedings otherwise than in the pages of a newspaper as defined in the Act of 1888.

In Wason v. Walter (g), Cockburn, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court said, that faithful and fair reports of the proceedings of courts of justice, though the characters of individuals may incidentally suffer, are privileged, and that for the publication of such reports the publishers are neither criminally nor civilly responsible. But a publication of the proceedings in a court of justice will not be protected unless it be a true and honest statement of those proceedings (h).

In Stiles v. Nokes (i), Ellenborough, C.J., said, ‘It often happens that circumstances necessary for the sake of public justice to be disclosed by a witness in a judicial inquiry are very distressing to the feelings of individuals on whom they reflect ; and if such circumstances were afterwards wantonly published, I should hesitate to say that such unnecessary publication was not libellous merely because the matter had been given in evidence in a court of justice’ (j).

(j) And see R. v. Salisbury, 1 Ld. Raym. 341, that it is indictable to publish a scandalous affidavit made in a Court of justice.

Where it is allowable to publish what passes in a court of justice it is not essential that every word of the evidence, of the speeches, and of what was said by the judge, should be inserted; if the report is substantially a fair and correct report of what took place in a court of justice, it is privileged (k). It may sometimes not be justifiable to publish everything a counsel says in the course of his speech (l).

The party making the publication will not be justified, unless he confines himself to what actually passed in court (m). Before the case of Wason v. Walter was decided, it was an established principle, upon which the privilege of publishing a report of any judicial proceedings was admitted to rest, that such report must be strictly confined to the actual proceedings in court, and must contain no defamatory observations or comments from any quarter whatever, in addition to what formed strictly and properly the legal proceedings. But fair comment upon any matter of public interest is privileged (n).

The privilege applies to the proceedings of every court of justice, from the lowest to the highest (o).

Proceedings before magistrates, under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), in which, after both parties are heard, a final judgment is given, are judicial, and the trial and the judgment may lawfully be made the subject of a printed report, if that report be impartial and correct (p); and the like privilege extends to the publication of proceedings taking place publicly on a preliminary inquiry held under the Indictable Offences Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42). The privilege now extends to reports of each separate stage of the proceeding, even to an ex parte application for process for an indictable offence (q).

It was at one time said that such publications had a tendency to cause great mischief by perverting the public mind, and disturbing the course of justice (r): and the Court of King's Bench granted a criminal information for publishing in a newspaper a statement of the evidence given before a coroner's jury, accompanied with comments; although the statement was correct, and the party had no malicious motive in the publication (s). In Wason v. Walter (t), Cockburn, C.J., is reported to have said, 'Even in quite recent days, judges, in holding the publication of the proceedings of courts of justice lawful, have thought it necessary to distinguish what are called ex parte proceedings as a probable exception from the operation of the rule. Yet ex parte proceedings before magistrates, and even before this Court, as, for instance, applications for criminal informations, are published every day; but such a thing as an action or indictment, founded on a report of such an ex parte proceeding, is unheard of, and if any such action or indictment should be brought, it would probably be held that the true criterion of the privilege is not whether the report was, or was not, ex parte, but whether it was a fair and honest report of what had taken place, published simply with a view to the information of the public, and innocent of all intention to do injury to the reputation of the party affected.' If the report of judicial proceedings is fair and impartial, the privilege is not taken away by the fact that the magistrate decided that he had no jurisdiction, or that the application was made ex parte (u).

Public Meetings.—By the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 64) (v), sect. 4, 'A fair and accurate report published in any newspaper (w) of the proceedings of a public meeting, or (except where neither the public nor any newspaper reporter is admitted) (ww), of any meeting of a vestry, town council, school board, board of guardians, board or local authority formed or constituted under the provisions of any Act of Parliament, or of any committee appointed by any of the above-mentioned bodies, or of any meeting of any commissioners authorised to act by letters patent, Act of Parliament, warrant under the Royal Sign Manual, or other lawful warrant or authority, select committees of either House of Parliament, justices of the peace in quarter sessions assembled for administrative or deliberative purposes, and the publication at the request of any Government office or department, officer of State, commissioner of police or chief constable of any notice or report issued by them for the information of the public, shall be privileged, unless it shall be proved that such report or publication was published or made maliciously: Provided, that nothing in this section shall authorise the publication of any blasphemous or indecent matter. Provided also that the protection intended to be afforded by this section shall not be available as a defence in any proceedings if it shall be proved that the defendant has been requested to insert in the newspaper in which the report or other publication complained of appeared a reasonable letter or statement by way of contradiction or explanation of such report or other publication, and has refused or neglected to insert the same; Provided further, that nothing in this section contained shall be deemed or construed to limit or abridge

(w) The word 'newspaper' shall mean 'any paper containing public news, intelligence, or occurrences, or any remarks or observations therein printed, for sale and published in England or Ireland periodically, or in parts or numbers, at intervals not exceeding twenty-six days between the publication of any two such papers, parts, or numbers. Also any paper printed in order to be dispersed and made public weekly or oftener, or at intervals not exceeding twenty-six days, containing only or principally advertisements.' 44 & 45 Vict. c. 60, s. 1.

any privilege now by law existing, or to protect the publication of any matter not of public concern, and the publication of which is not for the public benefit.

‘For the purposes of this section “public meeting” shall mean any meeting bona fide and lawfully held for a lawful purpose (x) and for the furtherance or discussion of any matter of public concern, whether the admission thereto be general or restricted.’

Statements made on a Privileged Occasion.—The publication of defamatory matter which is false is excused if made in good faith on a privileged occasion and without malice in fact. ‘The defence of privileged occasion is in a criminal case raised under a plea of not guilty. Whether the occasion was or was not privileged is a matter of law for the judge and not of fact for the jury (y). When the judge has ruled the occasion privileged the ordinary presumption of law that a defamatory publication is malicious is excluded (z), and in order to defeat the claim of privilege it becomes necessary for the prosecution to prove that the defendant in publishing the defamatory matter was actuated by express or actual malice in fact, i.e. by some wrong indirect or improper motive such as personal spite or ill-will against the person or class of persons defamed (a). The evidence necessary to defeat the claim of privilege may be intrinsic, i.e. may lie in the language used or in the circumstances (b), or extrinsic, i.e. by direct proof of other conduct or language of the defendant indicating personal ill-will (c). It is not enough for this purpose to prove that the words published are untrue or published by inadvertence or forgetfulness or negligently or with want of sound judgment or in honest indignation (d). But express malice can be proved by shewing that the defendant knew the words published to be untrue or did not believe them to be true (e), or that the words used are much too violent for the occasion and circumstances’ (f).

If at the close of the case for the prosecution there is no intrinsic or extrinsic evidence of express malice, it is the duty of the judge to direct a verdict for the defendant (ff); but wherever there is evidence of express malice, either intrinsic or extrinsic, it is the duty of the judge to leave the question of express malice to the jury (g). Where defamatory matter was published on a privileged occasion it is not enough for the prosecution to prove that the facts proved are consistent with the presence of malice as well as with its absence; for the absence of such malice is presumed until proof of its presence is given (h).

Where a letter containing defamatory words is written upon a privileged occasion, surrounding circumstances are to be considered in determining whether the words used are so much too violent for the occasion as to rebut the presumption of the absence of malice arising from the privilege of the occasion; and if from surrounding circumstances it appears that the words are capable of two constructions, one of which is compatible with the absence of malice, then the presumption of the absence of malice which existed in the first instance from the privilege of the occasion should be allowed to prevail throughout (i). But juries are directed not to scrutinise too closely the expressions used on a privileged occasion, but to satisfy themselves that there is clear evidence of malicious intent before finding that the privilege has been lost (j).

What constitutes a Privileged Occasion.—Belief in the truth of defamatory statements published creates no privilege, although disbelief in their truth will defeat a claim of privilege. The statements excused by proof that they were published on a privileged occasion include communications made in good faith in respect to a matter as to which the defendant has a legal, moral, social, or religious duty whether public or private (k), or in the general interests of society (l), or in respect whereof he has an interest, to another, who has a corresponding interest or duty with respect to the subject matter (m), and communications made in self-defence. An occasion is not privileged if a defamatory communication is made from motives of self-interest by persons who for the convenience of a class trade for profit in the character of other persons, e.g. trade-protection societies and inquiry agencies (n). The duty or interest must exist in law by reason of the facts of the case at the date of publication, and is not created by the belief of the defendant in its existence (o).

Where the occasion is privileged it is immaterial whether the statements were volunteered or made in answer to inquiries: but in cases near the line the fact that the information was volunteered is an element in determining whether the occasion is privileged (p).

If the communication is made in the regular and proper course of a proceeding, it is privileged. Thus where a writing, containing the defendant's case, and stating that some money, due to him from the Government for furnishing the guard at Whitehall with fire and candle, had been improperly obtained by a Captain C., was directed to a general officer and the four principal officers of the Guards, to be presented to His Majesty for redress a criminal information was refused, on the ground that the writing was merely a representation of an injury drawn up in a proper way for redress, without any intention to asperse the prosecutor although there was a suggestion of fraud (q). So a petition addressed by a creditor of an officer in the army to the Secretary-at-War, bona fide, and with the view of obtaining, through his interference, the payment of a debt due, and containing a statement of facts which, though derogatory to the officer's character, the creditor believed to be true, is not actionable (r). A letter written to the Postmaster-General, or to the Secretary to the General Post-Office, complaining of misconduct in a postmaster, or guard of a mail, is privileged, if written as a bona fide complaint to obtain redress for a grievance that the party really believes he has suffered (s). And where the defendant being deputy-governor of Greenwich Hospital, wrote a large volume, containing an account of the abuses of the hospital, and treating with much asperity the characters of many of the officers of the hospital (who were public officers), and of Lord Sandwich in particular, who was First Lord of the Admiralty, and printed several copies of it, which he distributed to the governors of the hospital only, and not to any other person, the Court refused to allow a criminal information to be filed. Lord Mansfield said, that distribution of copies to the persons who were from their situations called on to redress these grievances, and had, from their situations, competent power to do it, was not a publication sufficient to make the publication criminal (t). A letter written to a Secretary of State, imputing to the town clerk and clerk to the justices of a borough, corruption in the latter office, was held not to be privileged, because the Secretary of State had no direct authority in respect of the matter complained of, and was not a competent tribunal to receive the application (u). But a memorial presented to the Secretary of State for the Home Department by the elector of a borough complaining of the conduct of a justice of the peace during a recent election of a Member of Parliament for the borough, and imputing that he had made speeches inciting to a breach of the peace, and praying that the secretary would cause an inquiry to be made into the conduct of the plaintiff, and that, on the allegations being substantiated, the secretary would recommend to the Queen that the justice should be removed from the commission of the peace, is a privileged communication; for though the Lord Chancellor generally is consulted as to the removal of justices of the peace, the memorial might be considered as addressed to the Crown, through the secretary of state who might have caused the inquiry to be made, have communicated with the Lord Chancellor, and have, in effect, recommended the removal of the justice (v). And where the publication is an admonition, or in the course of the discipline of a religious sect, as the sentence of expulsion from a society of Quakers, it is privileged (w). So a letter written by a son-in-law to his mother-in-law, containing imputations on the character of a person whom she was about to marry, and desiring a diligent and intelligent inquiry into his character, if written bona fide is privileged (x). Where an advertisement was published by the defendant at the instigation of A., the plaintiff's wife, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the plaintiff had another wife living when he married A., it was held that although the advertisement might impute bigamy to the plaintiff, yet having been published under such authority, and with such a view, it was not actionable (y). But it is very doubtful whether the wife would now be considered to have sufficient interest in such an inquiry to justify the offering of such a reward in a newspaper (z).

A communication made by a solicitor on behalf of his client to a third party, if reasonably necessary and usual in the discharge of his duty to his client and in the interest of his client it is privileged (a).

If a report made by a medical officer of health to a local authority in pursuance of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), contains defamatory matter, a newspaper proprietor is not privileged to publish it, although the local authority is bound to publish it (b).

When business communications are made on a privileged occasion, i.e. on matters relevant to business between the parties and necessary in due regard to the interests of the parties (c) the privilege is not lost by publishing the communication in the ordinary course of dictation or transmission to clerks of the defendant (d). In other words the privilege covers all incidents of the transmission and treatment of the communication which are in accordance with the reasonable and usual course of business (e).

A letter written confidentially to persons who employed A. as their solicitor, conveying charges injurious to his professional character in the management of certain concerns which they had entrusted to him, and in which B., the writer of the letter, was likewise interested, was held to be privileged (f). And if a person, in a private letter to the party, should expostulate with him about some vices, of which he apprehends him to be guilty, and desire him to refrain from them; or if a person should send such a letter to a father, in relation to some faults of his children; these, it seems, would not be actionable but acts of friendship, not designed for defamation but reformation (g). But this doctrine must be applied with some caution; for to send an abusive letter filled with provoking language to another, is an offence of a public nature, and punishable as such, inasmuch as it tends to create ill blood, and cause a disturbance of the public peace (h). A letter written by a master, in giving a character of a servant, is privileged, unless its contents be not only false but malicious (i).

Where a tradesman's wife being informed that one of the female assistants was dishonest wrote her a letter accusing her of theft and reproaching her, Huddleston, B., held the occasion privileged, and said that if the prisoner honestly believed what she wrote, the manner in which she expressed herself ought not to be too nicely criticised (j).

If a tenant is asked by his landlord to make communications to him in respect of any neglect of duty in his gamekeepers, any communication made by him in respect of any such neglect of duty is privileged, if written bona fide, and on the supposition that he was doing his duty to his landlord (k). The plaintiff was the agent of the defendants, a trading company, and it was part of his duty to furnish them with an account of his transactions, to enable them to prepare the balance sheet for the inspection of the shareholders. This balance sheet was prepared and duly referred to the auditors, who reported that there was a deficiency, for which the plaintiff was responsible, and that his accounts had been badly kept. There was evidence that an explanation had been offered to the auditors, which they had disregarded, but no evidence that the directors had any knowledge of this explanation. The directors, after laying the accounts before a general meeting of the shareholders, caused a letter containing the part of the report which affected the character of the plaintiff to be printed and forwarded to the absent shareholders. It was held, first, that this letter was published on a privileged occasion, as it was the duty of the defendants to communicate to all the shareholders any part of the report of the auditors which materially affected the accounts of the company; secondly, that there was no intrinsic or extrinsic evidence of malice to be left to the jury, as the report of the auditors was published without comment, and the explanations offered to the auditors did not come before the defendants; and that causing the letter to be printed was a reasonable and necessary mode of publishing it to the absent shareholders (l).

If a man bona fide writes a letter in his own defence, and for the defence of his rights and interests, and is not actuated by any malice, that letter is privileged, although it may impute dishonesty to another (m).

A letter published by an attorney honestly in vindication of the character of a client against charges published and circulated against the client by the prosecutor, is privileged (n).

It has been held that the publication of defamatory matter by a trade inquiry or trade protection agency is not privileged when the society holds itself out as being ready for reward to communicate to subscribers and others confidential information as to the commercial standing of others for the exclusive use and benefit in business of the persons receiving the communication (o).

Defamatory telegrams or post cards are not privileged though sent bona fide, and under circumstances which otherwise would have made it privileged, because the mode of publication selected involves communication of the defamatory matter to persons who have no interest to receive it (p).

It has already been pointed out that the privilege must not exceed the occasion. Statements to be privileged must fall within the scope of the duty or interest which privileges the occasion; and must be published to persons entitled to hear them and not to strangers. Where, therefore, remarks were made reflecting on a Roman Catholic priest at a public meeting called for the purpose of petitioning Parliament against the grant to the Roman Catholic College at Maynooth it was held that the speaker was not privileged by the circumstance that the libel was published in the course of a bona fide discussion respecting the propriety of supporting that college (q).

3. Fair Comment.

It is also an answer to an indictment for defamatory libel (under the plea of not guilty) to prove that the matter complained of is 'fair comment' 'honestly' made without actual malice upon facts truly stated and with reference to a matter of public interest and concern (r). This defence is not in strictness identical with qualified privilege, because it is equally open to all the public, and there is no special right of comment in the case of newspapers. The plea—unlike qualified privilege—does not protect any false statement of fact (s) even if made in good faith (t), and what is claimed to be the comment must not be so mixed up with the facts as to make it difficult for the reader to distinguish what is fact and what is comment (u). Nor may the facts on which the comment is based be mis-stated: and if the facts on which the comment is made do not exist the defence of comment fails (v).

Comment cannot be fair which is built upon facts which are not truly stated, and further, it must not convey imputations of an evil sort except so far as the facts truly stated warrant the imputation (w).

‘A personal attack may form part of a fair comment upon given facts truly stated if it be warranted by those facts—in other words, in my view, if it be a reasonable inference from these facts. Whether the personal attack in any given case can reasonably be inferred from the truly stated facts upon which it purports to be a comment is a matter of law for the determination of the judge before whom the case is tried, but if he should rule that this inference is capable of being reasonably drawn, it is for the jury to determine whether in that particular case it ought to be drawn’ (x).

The imputation of corrupt motives cannot be relied on as fair comment unless warranted by the facts stated (y) or arising fairly and legitimately out of the conduct of the person criticised (y).

The term ‘of public interest’ covers public affairs, and the public acts of public men, the administration of justice, the doings of local authorities civil and ecclesiastical, and the working of public institutions such as hospitals and charities, literature and dramatic or pictorial art, and public entertainments or articles or letters in a newspaper (z), or any case where any person brings himself before the public (a), e.g. by offering himself as a Parliamentary candidate (b).

The Board of Admiralty having ordered the defendant, the Queen’s printer, to print a board minute relating to their proceedings in naval ship-building, which contained a letter of the Comptroller of the Navy in reference to plans of the plaintiff submitted to the board, the defendant sold copies to the public; the plaintiff sued the defendant for defamation, averring that a statement in such letter that the plans derived no weight from his antecedents, meant that his plans were worthless, and were calculated to injure him in his profession; but no actual malice was imputed. It was held, by the majority of the Court (Willes, Byles, and Brett, J.J. : dissentiente, Grove, J.), that the plaintiff was rightly non-suited on the ground that every man has a right to discuss freely, if honestly and without malice, any subject in which the public are generally interested, and that what the defendant had done merely amounted to this (c).

Comments by a churchwarden upon the conduct of the clergyman, in taking meals in the vestry, and in causing books to be sold in the church during service, are matters of public interest, and may lawfully be published if they do not exceed the boundaries of fair criticism (d).

‘In the case of literary or dramatic works (e) the occasion for fair comment is created by the publication and a right then arises to criticise honestly, however adversely’ (f).

and errors, and holding up the author to ridicule, is not regarded as defamatory if the comment does not exceed the limits of fair and candid criticism, e.g. by attacking the character of the writer, unconnected with his publication (g). But if a person under the pretence of criticising a literary work, defames the private character of the author, and, instead of writing in the spirit and for the purpose of fair and candid discussion, travels into collateral matter, and introduces facts not stated in the work, accompanied with injurious comments upon them, such person is a libeller (h). So if a reviewer imputes base, sordid, dishonest, and wicked motives, it is no answer that the reviewer published only what he believed was correct and true (i).

There is no distinction between a handbill, circular, or advertisement of a tradesman and a book; both are addressed to the public, and both are subject to such comments as do not exceed the bounds of fair and reasonable criticism (j).

It has been doubted whether the preaching a sermon, in the ordinary mode of a clergyman's duty, makes it public property, so as to allow observations upon it in the same way that a publication of a literary work does (k).

It is lawful to make a fair comment on a place of public entertainment (l).

Where the defence of fair comment is raised the state of mind of the defendant when he published becomes material, to ascertain whether he published in a spirit of unfairness or actuated by any malice, and extrinsic evidence is admissible to establish the defendant's motives in publication whether to shew his guilt or innocence (m).

4. Truth.

At common law the truth of a defamatory libel was no defence to criminal proceedings taken in respect of its publication (n).

If a libel imputes to a man that he has committed a crime, proof of the truth of such imputation is not admissible under a plea of not guilty. Where a libel imputed murder to certain soldiers, evidence was offered of the truth of such imputation, and rejected: and the Court of King's Bench were unanimous that such evidence was rightly rejected (o).

(g) Carr v. Hood, 1 Camp. 355. In an action for a libel upon the plaintiff in his business of a bookseller, accusing him of being in the habit of publishing immoral and foolish books, the defendant may adduce evidence to shew that the supposed libel is a fair stricture upon the general run of the plaintiff's publications. Tabart v. Tipper, 1 Camp. 350; Strauss v. Francis, 4 F. & F. 1107. If the plaintiff contends that the alleged libel exceeds the limits of fair criticism, he should, unless the contrary appears on the face thereof, put in his work as part of his case (S. C. and see 4 F. & F. 939).

(o) R. v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 95. Bayley, J., said (p. 147), 'In some cases, indeed, it is possible that the falsehood may be of the very essence of the libel. As for instance, suppose a paper were to state that A. was on a given day tried at a given place, and Where an information for a libel stated that certain transactions took place, and that the libel was published of and concerning them, and then set out the libel as referring to them, and general evidence was given in proof of such transactions on the part of the prosecution, the defendant was not allowed to give evidence of the particular nature of those transactions so as to bring into issue the truth or falsehood of the libel. But if such evidence were adduced, bona fide, to shew that the transactions referred to in the alleged libel are not the same with those which the information supposes it to have had in view, it is admissible (p).

By sect. 6 (q) of the Libel Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96), 'On the trial of any indictment or information for a defamatory libel, the defendant having pleaded such plea as hereinafter mentioned, the truth of the matters charged may be inquired into, but shall not amount to a defence, unless it was for the public benefit that the said matters charged should be published; and to entitle the defendant to give evidence of the truth of such matters charged as a defence to such indictment or information it shall be necessary for the defendant, in pleading to the said indictment or information, to allege the truth of the said matters charged in the manner now (r) required in pleading a justification to an action for defamation, and further to allege that it was for the public benefit that the said matters charged should be published, and the particular fact or facts by reason whereof it was for the public benefit that the said matters charged should be published, to which plea the prosecutor shall be at liberty to reply generally, denying the whole thereof; and if after such plea the defendant shall be convicted on such indictment or information it shall be competent to the court, in pronouncing sentence, to consider whether the guilt of the defendant is aggravated or mitigated by the said plea, and by the evidence given to prove or to disprove the same: provided always, that the truth of the matters charged in the alleged libel complained of by such indictment or information shall in no case be inquired into without such plea of justification: provided also, that in addition to such plea it shall be competent to the defendant to plead a plea of not guilty: provided also. that nothing in this Act contained shall take away or prejudice any defence under the plea of not guilty which it is now competent to the defendant to make under such plea to any action or indictment or information for defamatory words or libel.'

It has been held in Ireland that to an indictment for publishing in a newspaper a certain false, defamatory, malicious, and seditious libel concerning her Majesty's Government and the Parliament of the United Kingdom, with intent to create disaffection and hatred to her Majesty's convicted of perjury; if that be true it may be no libel, but if false, it is from beginning to end calumnious, and may no doubt be the subject of a criminal prosecution. Possibly, therefore, in such a case, evidence of the truth of such a statement by the production of the record, might afford an answer to a prosecution for libel.' R. v. Brigstock, 6 C. & P. 184.

(q) This section does not apply to proceedings at a preliminary inquiry before justices (R. v. Carden, 5 Q.B.D. 1. R. v. Townsend, 10 Cox, 356; 4 F. & F. 1089), unless the prosecution is of a person responsible for the publication of a newspaper for a libel published therein; 44 & 45 Vict. c. 60, s. 4, post, p. 1060.

(r) Aug. 24th, 1843, the date of the passing of the Act. The subsequent alterations in civil pleading are not in strictness applicable to a justification under sect. 6. For a precedent see Crown Office Rules, 1906, form No. 81.

Government and the Parliament, a special plea of justification cannot be pleaded under sect. 6 of the Libel Act, 1843 (s).

Where to a criminal information for a libel the defendant pleaded a justification, alleging that the imputations contained in the libel were true, it was held that it was not competent to the defendant to prove that imputations identical with those in the libel had been previously published in a book (t).

Where a justification is pleaded under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 6, to an information for a defamatory libel, and the libel contains several distinct imputations, and the plea alleges the truth of all, and is traversed generally, if the evidence fail as to any one of them, the verdict will be entered generally against the defendant. Where, therefore, upon the trial of such an issue upon such a plea, evidence was offered in support of some only of the imputations, and the jury found that only one of the imputations upon which evidence was offered was proved, the verdict was entered for the Crown generally; as there can be no partial finding for a defendant on the ground that a justification is partially established (u). But where the libel was general, to the effect that the prosecutor was one of a gang of cardsharppers, and the plea of justification alleged specific instances of cardsharpping, and also that the prosecutor confederated with others for the purpose of cheating, and did so cheat, at various places, it was held that it was sufficient to prove the plea in substance, and that it was so proved by the jury finding that in two instances the prosecutor did cheat at cards, and that he did confederate with other persons for that purpose (v).

Evidence in Aggravation or Mitigation.—By the express enactment that, wherever there is a conviction after such a plea of justification ‘the Court, in pronouncing sentence,’ shall ‘consider whether the guilt of the defendant is aggravated or mitigated by the said plea, and by the evidence given to prove and disprove the same,’ the Court is to consider the evidence on the one side and the other, and to form their own conclusion whether it aggravates or mitigates the guilt of the defendant, and they are to apportion the punishment accordingly. The evidence, as it appears on the notes of the judge who presided at the trial, comes in place of affidavits in aggravation and mitigation of punishment when sentence is to be pronounced, and by that the sentence is to be regulated, and not by any declaration of the jury as to the credit which they think ought to be given to the witnesses (w). In such a case the defendant may, in mitigation of punishment, shew by affidavit that after the publication, but before pleading, information was given to him which, if true, would have supported an allegation in the plea, evidence having been given at the trial to account for the non-production of proof, but no evidence in support of the allegation itself (x).

A libel purported to be founded on certain newspaper reports, and upon the foundation of those reports charged certain troops with acts of murder. After conviction the defendant tendered affidavits to prove that the newspapers did contain those reports, and also other affidavits that the facts were true. The former affidavits were received, because they explained the situation in which the defendant stood at the time he wrote the libel, and shewed the impression under which he wrote; but the latter were rejected, because the receiving them might deprive of a fair trial persons who might afterwards be tried for the murders; and if murders were committed, the proper course was to prosecute and bring to a fair trial, not to libel and create an unfair prejudice (y).

SECT. VIII.—SPECIAL PROVISIONS AS TO LIBELS IN NEWSPAPERS.

Reports.—The special provisions as to reports in newspapers of the proceedings of courts of justice and public meetings have already been stated, ante, pp. 1047, 1049.

Prosecution.—By sect. 8 (z) of the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 64), 'No criminal prosecution shall be commenced against any proprietor (a), publisher, editor, or any person responsible for the publication of a newspaper (a) for any libel (b) published therein without the order of a judge at chambers being first had and obtained (c). Such application shall be made on notice to the person accused who shall have an opportunity of being heard against such application' (d).

By sect. 4 of the Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 60), 'A court of summary jurisdiction, upon the hearing of a charge against a proprietor, publisher, or editor, or any person responsible for the publication of a newspaper, for a libel published therein, may receive evidence as to the publication being for the public benefit, and as to the matters charged in the libel being true, and as to the report being fair and accurate, and published without malice, and as to any matter which under this or any other Act, or otherwise, might be given in evidence by way of defence by the person charged on his trial on indictment, and the Court, if of opinion after hearing such evidence that there is a strong or probable presumption that the jury on the trial would acquit the person charged, may dismiss the case' (e).

Definitions.—By the Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 60), s. 1, 'newspaper' is defined for the purposes of the Act as meaning 'any paper containing public news, intelligence, or occurrences, or any remarks or observations therein (sic) printed for sale, and published in England or Ireland periodically or in parts or numbers at intervals not exceeding twenty-six days between the publication of any two such papers, parts, or numbers': and 'also any paper printed in order to be dispersed and made public weekly or oftener or at intervals not exceeding twenty-six days, containing only or principally advertisements.'

By the same section 'The word "proprietor" shall mean and include as well the sole proprietor of any newspaper, as also in the case of a divided proprietorship the persons who, as partners or otherwise, represent and are responsible for any share or interest in the newspaper as between themselves and the persons in like manner representing or responsible for the other shares or interests therein, and no other person.'

Ascertainment of the Names of Proprietors, &c.—By sect. 8 a register of newspapers as above defined is established under the superintendence of the registrar of joint stock companies, to which the printers and publishers of every such newspaper must make an annual return in a prescribed form, of the title of the newspaper and the names and addresses of all the proprietors (s. 9). These provisions do not apply where the newspaper is owned by a joint stock company incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1901, in which case the company is registered in the ordinary course under those Acts (s. 18). Penalties are imposed for failing to make returns under the Act of 1881, or for wilful misrepresentation or omissions therein (ss. 10, 12). The returns when made are entered on the register (s. 13). And by sect. 15, 'Every copy of an entry in or extract from the register of newspaper proprietors, purporting to be certified by the registrar or his deputy for the time being or under the official seal of the registrar, shall be received as conclusive evidence of the contents of the said register of newspaper proprietors, so far as the same appears in such copy or extract without proof of the signature thereto or of the seal of office affixed thereto, and every such certified copy or extract shall in all proceedings, civil and criminal, be accepted as sufficient prima facie evidence of all the matters and things thereby appearing unless and until the contrary thereof be shewn.'

By a series of enactments of earlier date incorporated in the schedule to the Newspapers, Printers, and Reading Rooms Repeal Act, 1869 (f) (32 & 33 Vict. c. 24), obligations are placed on the printers and publishers

(f) The first Act dealing with this subject, 38 Geo. III. c. 78, was repealed and replaced by 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 76, s. 32, itself repealed by the Act of 1869, except sect. 19, re-enacted in the schedule, but relating only to civil proceedings, viz. bills for the discovery of the names of printers, publishers and newspapers, for the purposes of actions of damages for defamation. There were numerous decisions on 38 Geo. III. c. 78, as to proof of publication, included in the 6th edition of this work, i. 638-640, which are here omitted as of no present value. Where in an action for libel to prove that the defendant, H., was the proprietor of a newspaper, a certified copy of the declaration made at the stamp office under 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 76, s. 6 (rep.), was put in, and it was a joint declaration, and stated that, 'We are the sole proprietors; that is to say, the said J. H., as legal owner as mortgagee, and M. Y., as owner of the equity of redemption,' it was objected that this declaration shewed that the defendant was a mortgagee only, and not a proprietor against whom an action for libel could be maintained; but Campbell, C.J., held that the defendant was liable. *Duke of Brunswick v. of papers and books as to printing therein the name of the printer and preserving copies of papers. The substance of the scheduled enactments is as follows :—

By the Unlawful Societies Act, 1799 (39 Geo. III. c. 79), s. 29 (g), ‘ Every person who shall print any paper for hire, reward, gain or profit, shall carefully preserve and keep one copy (at least) of every paper so printed by him or her, on which he or she shall write, or cause to be written or printed, in fair and legible characters, the name and place of abode of the person or persons by whom he or she shall be employed to print the same ; and every person printing any paper for hire, reward, gain, or profit, who shall omit or neglect to write, or cause to be written or printed as aforesaid, the name and place of his or her employer on one of such printed papers, or to keep or preserve the same for the space of six calendar months next after the printing thereof, or to produce and shew the same to any justice of the peace who within the said space of six calendar months shall require to see the same, shall for every such omission, neglect, or refusal, forfeit and lose the sum of twenty pounds.’

By sect. 31 (g), ‘ nothing herein contained shall extend to the impression of any engraving, or to the printing by letterpress of the name or the name and address, or business or profession, of any person, and the articles in which he deals, or to any papers for the sale of estates or goods by auction or otherwise.’ Sects. 34, 35 & 36 relate to the recovery of the penalties. The Act of 1799 does not apply to ‘ papers printed by the authority and for the use of either House of Parliament ’ (h) nor to bank notes or bank post bills of the Bank of England or to valuable securities, or to prints of proceedings in courts of justice or to papers printed by the authority of any public board or public officer in the execution of the duties of their respective offices (i).

By an Act of 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 12), s. 2 (j), ‘ Every person who shall print any paper or book whatsoever which shall be meant to be published or dispersed, and who shall not print upon the front of every such paper, if the same shall be printed on one side only, or upon the first or last leaf of every paper or book which shall consist of more than one leaf, in legible characters, his or her name and usual place of abode or business ; and every person who shall publish or disperse, or assist in publishing or dispersing, any printed paper or book on which the name and place of abode of the person printing the same shall not be printed as aforesaid, shall for every copy of such paper so printed by him or her forfeit a sum not more than five pounds. Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to impose any penalty upon any person for printing any paper excepted out of the operation of the Unlawful Societies Act, 1799, either in the said Act or by any Act made for the amendment thereof.’ (Vide supra.)

By sect. 3, in the case of books or papers printed at the University Press of Oxford, or the Pitt Press of Cambridge, the printer, instead of printing his name thereon, shall print the following words : ‘ Printed at

The provisions of the Acts of 1869 and 1881 do not exclude the proof of publication by modes other than those permitted by the statutes.

In moving for a criminal information a prosecutor was not bound to adopt the statutory proof, but if he adopted any other, the publication must have been shewn by some direct proof (m).

Newspaper Proprietor's Responsibility Presumed.—Code sec. 329.

Evidence.—It must be proved that the defendant was proprietor or publisher of the journal at the time of the publication of the libel. R. v. Sellars, 6 Montreal Legal News 197.

When the accused in a case of defamatory libel in a newspaper resorts to the defence allowed by Code sec. 329 that the publication of the libel was made without his knowledge, the Crown may prove the publication of former libels of a similar character by the same editor, in order to establish the liability of the accused resulting by the terms of article 329 from his continuing to retain this editor in the conduct of the newspaper. R. v. Molleur (No. 1) (1905), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 8.

Sec. 3.—Trial.

Place of Trial.—Code sec. 888.

In order to obtain a change of venue in a prosecution for defamatory libel such facts must be shewn as will satisfy the Court that a fair trial cannot be had at the present venue, and it is not sufficient that the applicant's solicitor swears to a belief that a fair trial is impossible there because of the prosecutor's interest in political affairs. The fact that two abortive trials of the cause have already taken place at both of which the jury disagreed, is not of itself a ground for ordering a change of venue. R. v. Nicol (1900), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 1 (B.C.).

General Verdict of Not Guilty.—Code sec. 956.

This section originated in the English Act of 1792, 32 Geo. III. ch.

60, which became part of the law of the Province of Canada. Under it, it is for the jury to say whether, under the facts proved, there is libel and whether the defendant published it. R. v. Dougall (1874), 18 L.C. Jur. 85.

Sec. 4.—Punishment.

For Publishing or Threatening to Publish with Intent to Extort, etc.—Code sec. 332.

For Libel Known to be False.—Code sec. 333.

For Defamatory Libel.—Code sec. 334.

Sec. 5.—Indictment.

Innuendo.—An indictment charging the publication of a defamatory libel, which does not state that the same was likely to injure the reputation of the libelled person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, or was designed to insult him, is bad by reason of the omission of an essential ingredient of the offence. R. v. Cameron (1898), 2 Can. Cr. Cas. 173.

On an indictment for a libel published in a newspaper, it appeared that the editor (who was not indicted) before inserting the libel shewed it to the prosecutor, who did not express any wish to suppress the publication, but wrote a reply, which was also inserted. The jury found it to be a malicious libel, and defendants were convicted. The Court held that what the prosecutor said to the editor, and did, did not hold out any assurance of impunity to the defendants, so as to render the conviction illegal, and a new trial was refused. R. v. McElderry (1860), 19 U.C.Q.B. 168.

When an indictment for defamatory libel consisting of words harmless in themselves, but importing by innuendo an imputation of dishonourable conduct contains in addition to the enunciation of the incriminating words an allegation of the sense in which they should be understood the Crown will be allowed to prove extrinsic circumstances which impute this meaning to them. It is not necessary to enumerate these circumstances in the indictment, and the accused is sufficiently guarded against surprise by the right that he has to demand particulars. See Code secs. 859-860. Failing to do so, he will not be allowed to object to the admission of the evidence above mentioned and the question of its legality is not one which can be reserved for the opinion of the Court of Appeal. R. v. Molleur (No. 1) (1905), 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 8.

A person alive to the vindication of his character when assaulted and entitled to the remedy of criminal information must apply with reasonable promptitude. The general rule is stated by Lord Mansfield in R. v. Robinson (1765), 1 W. Bl. 542, where he said: "There is no precise number of weeks, months or years; but, if delayed, the delay must be reasonably accounted for. The party complaining must come to the Court either during the term next after the cause of complaint arose, or at so early a period in the second term thereafter as to enable the accused, unless prevented by the accumulation of business in the Court, or other cause within the second term; and this regardless of the fact whether an assize intervened or not. R. v. Kelly (1877), 28 U.C.C.P. 35, 41 U.C.Q.B. (1877), 1, 24.

It is of the highest importance that the applicant for a criminal information should in all cases lay before the Court all the circumstances fully and candidly in order that the Court may deal with the matter. R. v. Wilkinson (1877), 41 U.C.Q.B. 1, 25 (citing R. v. Aunger, 28 L.T.N.S. 634 (S.C.), 12 Cox 407.

The granting of a criminal information is discretionary with the Court under all circumstances; the application is not to be entertained on light or trivial grounds. In dealing with such an application, the Court has always exercised a considerable extent of discretion in seeing whether the rule should be granted, and whether the circumstances are such as to justify the Court in granting the rule for a criminal information. R. v. Wilkinson (1877), 41 U.C.Q.B. 1, 29.

There are two things principally to be considered in dealing with such an application; (1) To see whether the person who applies to conduct the prosecution, the relator or the informer, has been himself free from blame, even though it would not justify the defendant in making the accusation; (2) To see whether the offence is of such magnitude that it would be proper for the Court to interfere and grant the criminal information. Both these things have to be considered, and the Court would not make its process of any value unless the Judges considered them and exercised a deal of discretion, not merely in saying whether there is legal evidence of the offence having been committed, but also exercising their discretion as men of the world, in judging whether there is reason for a criminal information or not." R. v. Plimsoll (1873), noted in 12 C.L.J. 227; R. v. Wilkinson (1877), 41 U.C.Q.B. 1, 29.

"The Court always considers an application for a criminal information as a summary extraordinary remedy depending entirely on their discretion, and therefore not only must the evidence itself be of a serious nature, but the prosecutor must apply promptly or must satisfactorily account for any apparent delay. He must also come into Court with clean hands, and be free from blame with reference to the transaction complained of; he must prove his entire innocence of everything imputed to him, and must produce to the Court such legal evidence of the offence having been committed by the defendant as would warrant a grand jury in finding a true bill against the defendants."

Per Quain, J., in R. v. Plimsoll (1873), noted, 12 C.L.J., p. 228, cited by Hagarty, C.J., in R. v. Kelly (1877), 28 U.C.C.P. 35.

The Court confines the granting of criminal informations for libel to the case of persons occupying official or judicial positions, and filling some offices which gives the public an interest in the speedy vindication of their character, or to the case of a charge of a very grave or atrocious nature; leave was therefore refused to the manager of a large railway company to file a criminal information for libel, on the ground that he did not come within the description of persons referred to. Per Armour, J.—“I think the practice of granting leave to file criminal informations in this country, having regard to the social conditions of its inhabitants and the liberties which they enjoy, is, to say the least of it, of very doubtful expediency, and should, in my opinion, be discontinued and, if necessary, abolished by legislative enactment. The very rule adopted in England, that it will only be granted to what I may call ‘a superior person’ is the strongest reason, to my mind, why in this country it should never be granted at all. Whatever may be deemed desirable in England, I do not think it desirable that in this country there should exist a remedy for the superior person which is denied to the inferior.” R. v. Wilson (1878), 43 U.C.Q.B. 583.

Per Cameron, J.—“There is no real necessity, so far as I am aware, for any one seeking this remedy. Any person libelled has a right to lay an information before a magistrate charging any one who may have libelled him with the offence, and may then by his oath deny the truth of the slanderous charge or imputations.” Ibid. Hagarty, C.J., added that it was not to be understood that the Court laid down any absolute rule as to future applications for criminal informations, or that they meant to fetter their discretion in dealing therewith. Ibid. Reporter’s note. R. v. Wilson (1878), 43 U.C.Q.B. 583.

Where the libel charges the person libelled with having, by a previous writing, provoked it, the latter by his affidavit on which he moves for a criminal information is bound to answer such charge otherwise the affidavit will be held insufficient. R. v. Edward Whelan (1862), 1 P.E.I. Rep. 220, per Peters, J.

In Trinity Term, 1876, an application was made for a criminal information for libel in newspapers published on 23rd and 30th March and 25th May. The delay in not applying to the Court during Easter Term, or until 30th August, was not satisfactorily accounted for, and the Court refused the application, but, in view of the virulent language of the article, without costs. R. v. Kelly (1877), 28 U.C.C.P. 35.

In answer to an application for a criminal information for libel the defendants filed an affidavit stating that they had no personal knowledge of the matter contained in the alleged libels, but received the information from persons whom they trusted to be reliable and trustworthy; that the Globe newspaper was controlled by the applicant, who was an active politician, and had published a number of articles violently attacking one S., who was a candidate for a public office, and the libels in question were published with a view of counter-acting the effect of these articles, and believing them to be true, and without malice. This was held to be no ground for the Court refusing to the applicant leave to file a criminal information for the reiterated publication in a newspaper of matter not pretended either to be not libellous, or to be true in fact. R. v. Thompson (1874), 24 U.C.C.P. 252.

Quære, whether a criminal information is the course to be adopted for wilful and corrupt misconduct of a Judge holding an inferior Court of record. R. v. Ford (1853), 3 U.C.C.P. 209, 218.

Where there is foundation for a libel, though it falls short, of justification, an information will not be granted. The Queen v. Biggs, 2 Man. R. 18.

Sec. 6.—Evidence.

A commission to take the evidence of witnesses abroad in a libel prosecution is properly ordered at the trial where the evidence relates wholly to a plea of justification just entered of record. R. v. Nicol (1898), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 31 (B.C.).

Where a convicted person, instead of being sentenced is discharged from custody upon entering into a recognizance with sureties to appear and receive judgment when called upon, it is only on motion of the Crown that the recognizance can be estreated, or judgment moved against him. In Ontario, a private prosecutor in a prosecution for defamatory libel has no locus standi to make the application. R. v. Young (1901), 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 580 (Ont.).

See Code sec. 947 as to evidence in respect of the publication of an extract from an authorized Parliamentary publication.

Sec. 7.—Matters of Defence.

(1) Absolute Privilege.

(a) Publication by petition to or under authority of Parliament.

Code sec. 321.

Certificate of publication by order of Parliament. Code sec. 912.

Copy of report may be laid before Court. Code sec. 913.

Stay of proceedings had on dismissal. Code secs. 912, 913.

(b) Publication in judicial proceedings. Code sec. 320.

(2) Qualified Privilege.

(a) Fair reports of proceedings in Parliament. Code sec. 322.

The Court has power summarily to commit for constructive contempt notwithstanding secs. 322, 324 and 325 as to fair reports of Court proceedings and fair comment upon public affairs; but the Court will not exercise the power where the offence is of a trifling nature, but only when necessary to prevent interference with the course of justice. Stoddard v. Prentice (1898), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 103, 6 B.C.R. 308.

The privilege given to a report published in good faith of judicial proceedings does not extend to the publication of declarations made by one of the counsel out of Court and in private conversation. Desjardins v. Berthiaume, 16 Que. S.C. 506.

Code sec. 322 refers to libel and not to contempt of Court, and there is still power to commit summarily for constructive contempt, ex. gr., a newspaper editorial to the effect that one of the parties to a pending suit will lose the case. Stoddard v. Prentice (1898), 5 Can. Cr. Cas. 103, 6 B.C.R. 308.

(c) Reply Denying.—Code sec. 910(4).

A plea of justification must set forth concisely the particular facts by reason of which its publication was for the public good, but must not contain the evidence by which it is proposed to prove such facts, nor any statements purely of comment or argument. R. v. Grenier, 1 Can. Cr. Cas. 55.

A plea of justification, which embodies a number of letters which it is proposed to use as evidence, and contains paragraphs of which the matter consists merely of comments and argument, is irregular and illegal; and should be struck from the record, or the illegal averment should be struck out, and the defendant allowed to plead anew. Ibid.

To an indictment for libel, the language of which was couched in general terms, the defendant pleaded that the words and statements complained of in the indictment were true in substance and in fact, and that it was for the public benefit, etc. It was held that the plea was insufficient because it did not set out the particular facts upon which the defendant intended to rely. R. v. Creighton (1890), 19 O.R. 339.

The existence of rumours cannot be proved in justification of the libel. R. v. Dougall (1874), 18 L.C. Jur. 85.

In a prosecution for an illegal defamatory libel contained in a newspaper article condemning an employer's dismissal of employees belonging to a trade union and charging that the distribution of certain gratuities by the employer to his employees was impelled by motives of selfishness on his part and was for the purpose of winning public approval and favourable public comment through press notices thereof, a plea of justification will not be struck out on the objection that the facts therein alleged do not shew that it was for the public benefit that the publication should be made, if such plea contains a charge that the press notices favourable to the complainant were published at his instance. If the complainant in a prosecution for defamatory libel has himself called public attention to the subject-matter of the alleged libel by obtaining the publication of newspaper articles commending his conduct therein, he thereby invites public criticism thereof and cannot object that the answer to his own articles is not a publication in the public interest. R. v. Brazeau (1899), 3 Can. Cr. Cas. 89 (Que.).

Where on the trial of a criminal information for libel the Judge in substance told the jury that the defendant, under the pleas of justification, was bound to shew the truth of the whole of the libel to which the plea is pleaded, and that in his opinion, the evidence fell far short of the whole matter charged; such a direction is not so much a direction on the law as a strong observation on the evidence, which may be made in a proper case without being open to the charge of misdirection. R. v. Port Perry, etc., Co., 38 U.C.Q.B. 431; R. v. Wilkinson (1878), 42 U.C.Q.B. 492, 505 (per Harrison, C.J., Wilson, J, dissenting).
